MIND OF THE FRONT.

From Death and dark Oblivion (neer the same)
The Mistress of Mans life, grave HISTORY, Raising the World to good, or evil FAME,
Doth vindicate it to ETERNITY.

High PROVIDENCE would so: that nor the Good Might be defrauded, nor the Great secur'd,
But both might know their wayes are understood,
And the reward and punishment assur'd.

This makes, that lighted by the beamy hand
Of TRUTH, which searcheth the most hidden springs, And guided by EXPERIENCE; whose straight W and Doth mete, whose Line doth sound the depth of things;

She cheerfully supporteth what she rears:
Assisted by no strengths, but are her own.
Some note of which each varied Pillar bears,
By which, as proper Titles she is known,

Times Witness, Herald of Antiquity,
The Light of Truth, and Life of Memory.

The true and lively portraiture of the honourable

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, in the first Book of the first Part of the History of the World.

Of the Creation and Preservation of the WORLD.

§. I.

That the Invisible God is seen in his Creations.

§. II. That the wisest of the Heathen, whose Authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the World to have been created by God.

§. IV. Of the meaning of the words [Heaven and Earth] Gen. i. 1.

§. V. That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the body of the Earth, is by Moles understood in the word [Earth:] and that the Earth, by the Attributes of Unformed and Void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

§. VI. How it is to be understood, that the Spirit of God moveth upon the Waters, and that this is not to be searched curiously.

§. VII. Of the Light created, as the material substance of the Sun, and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and use of it: and of motion, and heat annexed unto it.

§. VIII. Of the Firmament, and of the Waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Crystalline Heaven, or any Primum Mobile.

§. IX. A conclusion, repeating the sum of the works in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it; The finishing of it.

§. X. That nature is no Principium per se, nor Form, the giver of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should have any pre-portion with their effects.

§. XI. Of Fate, and that the Stars have great influence: and that their operation may diversely be prevented or furthered.

§. XII. Of Prescience.

§. XIII. Of Providence.

§. XIV. Of Predesination.

§. XV. Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seem to be by Fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

CHAP. II.

Of Mans estate in his first Creation, and of Gods rest.

§. I.

Of the Image of God, according to which Adam was first created.

§. II. Of

The Contents.

§. II. Of the intellectual mind of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God : and that this Image is much deformed by sin.

§. III. Of our base and frail bodies : and that the care thereof should yield to the immortal soul.

§. IV. Of the Spirit of life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

§. V. That Adam is, as it were, a little World, with a digest touching our mortality.

§. VI. Of the free power which Man had in his first Creation to dispose of himself.

§. VII. Of Gods ceasing to create any more : and of the cause thereof, because the Universal created was exceeding good.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken, and that it is no marvel that men should erre.

§. II. A recital of strange opinions touching Paradise.

§. III. That there was a true local Paradise Eastward, in the Country of Eden.

§. IV. Why it should be needful to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

§. V. That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Barbs.

§. VI. That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought, making the Ocean to be the Fountain of those four Rivers.

§. VII. Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moon : and of others which make it higher than the middle Region of the air.

§. VIII. Of their opinion that seat Paradise under the Equinoctial : and of the pleasant habitation under those Climates.

§. IX. Of the change of the names of places, and that besides that Eden in Cœlo Syria, there is a Country in Babylon once of this name, as is proved out of Esay 37. and Ezech. 27.

§. X. Of divers other testimonies of the Land of Eden : And that this is the Eden of Paradise.

§. XI. Of the difficulty in the Text, which seemeth to make the four Rivers to rise from one stream.

§. XII. Of the strange fertility and happiness of the Babylonian soil, as it is certain that Eden was such.

§. XIII. Of the River Pison, and the Land of Havilah.

§. XIV. Of the river Gehon, and the Land of Cush : and of the ill translating of Abissinia for Cush, a Chron. p. 16.

Of the two chief Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

That the Tree of Life was a material tree ; and in what sense it is to be taken ; that Man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subject to death.

§. II. Of Becanus his opinion, that the tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

§. III. Of Becanus his not unwitty allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

§. IV. Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil : with some other notes touching the story of Adams sin.

CHAP. V.

Of divers Memorable things between the fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

§. I.

OF the cause and revenge of Cains sin : and of his going out from God.

§. II. Of Cains dwelling in the land of Nod, and of his City Enoch.

§. III. Of Moyses his omitting sundry things concerning Cains generation.

§. IV. Of the diversities in the Age of the Patriarchs, when they begat their children.

§. VI. Of the Patriarchs delivering their knowledge by Tradition : and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

§. VII. Of the men of War before the Flood.

§. VIII. That the Giants, by Moyses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies : as also divers in later times.

CHAP.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanquishing in the World : and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

That in old corruptions we may find some signs of more ancient truth.

§. II. That the corruptions themselves were very ancient : as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

§. III. That in process of time these lesser errors drew on greater, as appeareth in the gross superstitions of the Egyptians.

§. IV. That from the Reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were invented : and that the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

§. V. Of the three chiefest Jupiters, and also the strange story of the third.

§. VI. Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of gods.

§. VII. That the wisest of the ancient Heathen had far better opinions of God.

§. VIII. That Heathens, and Judais, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noahs Flood.

§. I.

OF Gods fore warning : and some humane testimonies : and some doubting touching the truth of Noahs Flood.

§. II. Of the flood in the time of Ogyges : and that this was not Noahs Flood.

§. III. Of Deucalions Flood : and that this was not Noahs flood ; nor the Umbri in Italy a remnant of any universal Flood.

§. IV. Of some other Records testifying the universal Flood : and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt : and of some else where.

§. V. That the Flood of Noah was supernatural, though some say it might have been foreseen by the stars.

Of the second Book.

§. VI. That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the universal Flood : and what are Cataractæ Cæli, Gen. 7. 11.

§. VII. Of some remembrance of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

§. VIII. Of sundry particulars touching the Ark : as the place where it was made ; the matter, fashion and name.

§. X. That the Ark rested upon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucaus) between the East Indies and Scythia.

§. I.

A Preterition of some questions less material : with a note of the use of this question, to find out the Metropolis of Nations.

§. II. A proposal of the common opinion, That the Ark rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

§. III. The first Argument against the common opinion : They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so near a place as Armenia.

§. IV. The second Argument, That the Eastern people were more ancient in populousity, and in all humane glory.

§. VI. The fourth Argument ; From divers considerations in the person of Noah.

§. VII. Of the senseless opinion of Annus the Commenter upon Berosus, That the Ark rested upon Montes Caspii in Armenia ; and yet upon Cordia, which are three hundred miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.

§. VIII. The fifth Argument ; The Vine must grow naturally near the place where the Ark rested.

§. IX. An answer to an objection out of the words of the Text, The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole Earth.

§. X. An answer to the objection from the name of Ararat taken for Armenia ; and the height of the Hills there.

§. XI. Of Caucasus, and divers far higher Hills than the Armenian.

§. XII. Of divers incongruities, if in this story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

§. XIII. Of the contrary situation of Armenia unto the place noted in the Text : and that it is no marvel, that the same ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all a-long, and even in India be called Ararat.

§. XIV. Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountains Caucaſi, and toward the Eaſt-Indies, and of other excellencies of the ſoil.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the firſt planting of Nations after the Flood: and of the Sons of Noah; Shem, Ham, and Japhet, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

n. I.
WHether Shem and Ham were elder than Japhet.

n. II. Of divers things that in all reaſon are to be preſumed, touching the firſt planting of the World; as that all Hiſtories muſt yield to Moſes: that the World was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and, that the known great Lords of the firſt ages were of the ſiſe of Ham.

n. III. Of the Iſles of the Gentiles in Japhets poſſeſſion: of Berolus his too ſpeedy ſailing Gomer the ſon of Japhet in Italy; and another of Japhets ſons Tubal, in Spain: and alſo of the antiquity of Longinque Navigation.

n. IV. Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Meſech, ſeated firſt about Aſia the leſſe, out of Ezrech. 38. 39.

n. V. Againſt the fabulous Berolus, his Fiction, that the Italian Janus was Noah.

n. VI. That Gomer alſo, and his ſon Togorma, of the poſterity of Japhet, were firſt ſeated about Aſia the leſſe: and that from thence they ſpread Weſtward into Europe, and Northward into Samaria.

n. VII. Of Javan the fourth ſon of Japhet; and of Meſech of Aram, and Meſhech of Japhet.

n. VIII. Of Aſcanes and Riphath, the two elder ſons of Gomer.

n. IX. Of the four ſons of Javan: and of the double ſignification of Thartis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

n. X. That the ſeat of Chuſh, the eldeſt ſon of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of ſtrange Fables, and ill tranſlations of Scripture, grounded upon the miſtaking of this point.

§. I.
OF Joſephus his Tale of an Ethiopeſſe, wife to Moſes, grounded on the miſtaking of the ſeat of Chuſh.

§. III. Chuſh ill expounded for Ethiopia. Ezrechiel 29. 10.

§. V. A place, Elay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chuſh for Ethiopia.

§. VI. That upon the like miſtaking, both Terhaka, the Story of Semacherib, and Lera in the Story of Ala, are unadviſedly made Ethiopians.

§. XI.
Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Egypt.

§. I.

That Mizraim the chief Planter of Egypt, and the reſt of the ſons of Ham, were ſeated in order one by another.

§. II. Of the time about which the name of Egypt, began to be known: and of the Egyptians Lunar years, which made their Antiquities ſeem the more fabulous.

§. III. Of certain vain aſſertions of the Antiquity of the Egyptians.

§. IV. Againſt Pererius, That it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within two hundred years after the Creation: at leaſt, that both it, and the moſt parts of the world were peopled before the Flood.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about thoſe times.

§. I.

That Nimrod was the firſt after the Flood that reigned like Sovereign Lord: and that his beginning ſeemeth to have been of juſt authority.

§. II. That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three diſtinct perſons.

§. III. That Nimrod, not Aſſur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Elay 23. 13. that Aſſur, built Ur of the Chaldees.

§. IV. Of the acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known.

§. V. That we are not to marvel how ſo many Kingdoms could be erected about theſe times: and of Vexoris of Egypt; and of Tanais of Scythia.

Of Zoroaſter, ſuppoſed to have been the chief Author of Magick Arts: and of divers kinds of Magick.

§. I.

That Zoroaſter was not Cham, nor the firſt Inventor of Aſtrology, or of Magick: and that there were divers great Magicians of this name.

§. II. Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently far divers from Conjuring and Witchcraft.

§. III. That the good knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to be condemned; though the Devil here, as in other kinds, hath ſought to obſcure evil things under the name and colour of good things.

§. V. The abuſe of things, which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemn the right uſe of them.

§. VIII. That none was ever raiſed from the dead, by the power of the devil: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus: and of his wife Semiramis: and of other her acts.

§. I.

OF the magnificent building of Ninive by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

§. III. Of

§. III. Of Semiramis Parentage, and education: and Metamorphosis of her Mother.
§. IV. Of her Expedition into India, and death after disfigurement: with a note of the improbability of her vices.

§. V. Of the Temple of Belus, built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, in the second Book of the first Part of the History of the World.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of Abraham: and of the use of this question, for the ordering of the story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

OF some of the successors of Semiramis: with a brief transition to the question, about the time of the birth of Abraham.

§. II. A proposal of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the year 322. after the Flood, and not in the year 352.

§. III. The answer to one of the Objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan, and not, after his fathers death.

§. IV. The answer to another of the Objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year.

§. V. The answer to two more of the Objections, shewing that we may have certainty of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest son: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

§. VI. That the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest: together with divers reasons, proving that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah.

§. VII. A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Author on both sides: with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more improbable.

§. VIII. A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded upon the times noted in the story of Abraham.

§. IX. That Amraphel, one of the four Kings, whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have been Ninias the son of Ninus.

§. X. Of Arioch another of the four Kings:

and that Ellas, whereof he is said to have been King, lies between Caelofyria, and Arabia Petraea.

§. XI. Of Tidal, another of the four Kings.
§. XII. That Chedorlaomer, the chief of the four Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

§. XIII. That it is not unprobable, that the four Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we need not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Egypt, from the first peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A brief of the Names and Times of the first Kings of Egypt: with a note of the difficulties of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

§. II. That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise it appears that Chams reign in Egypt began in the year after the Flood 191.

§. III. That these Dynasties were not divers Families of King, but rather successions of Regents: of times many under one King.

§. IV. Of Cham, and his son Mizraim, or Ofliris.

§. V. Of the time when Ofliris reign ended: and that Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the son of Ofliris.

§. VI. Of Tiphon, Hercules Egyptus, Orus, and the two Scelftrees, successively reigning after Mizraim: and of divers errors about the former Scelftrees.

raelites: and of his successor Queen Thermutis, that took up Moles out of the water.

§. VIII. Of the two brethren of Queen Thermutis: and what King it was under whom Moles was born: and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I.

OF the time of Moles birth: and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

§. II. Of divers Cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this story, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

§. III. Of the cruelty against the Israelites young children in Egypt: and of Moles his preservation and education.

§. IV. Of Moles his flying out of Egypt: and the opinions of certain ancient Historians: of his War in Ethiopia, and of his marriage there: Philo his judgement of his pastoral life: and that of Pererius of the books of Genesis and Job.

§. V. Of Pharaohs pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so far as Succoth.

§. VI. Of the Solar and Lunar years, and how they are reconciled: with the form of the Hebrew year, and their manner of intercalation.

§. VII. Of the passage of Israel, from Succoth, towards the Red Sea: and of the divers ways leading out of Egypt.

§. VIII. Of their passage over the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea itself.

CHAP. IV.

Of the journeying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was given them: with a discourse of Laws.

§. I.

A Transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronology, with a continuation of the story, untill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

§. II. Of the Amalekites, Midianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battel with the Amalekites, and Jethros coming, who being a Kenite, was Priest of Midian.

§. III. Of the time when the Law was given:

with divers commendations of the invocation of Laws.

§. IV. Of the name and meaning of the words Law, and Right.

§. V. Of the definition of Laws, and of the Law eternall.

§. VI. Of the Law of Nature.
§. VII. Of the written Law of God.

§. VIII. Of the unwritten Law of God given to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

§. IX. Of the Morall, Judiciall, and Ceremoniall Law: with a Note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moles.

§. X. A proposal of nine other points to be considered, with a doubt of the five first.

§. X. III. Of the severall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandements, but in our default.

§. X. IIII. If there were not any Religion, nor Judgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.

§. X. V. Of humane Law, written, and unwritten.

§. X. VI. That onely the Prince is exempt from humane Laws: and in what sort.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites, from the receiving of the Law, to the death of Moles.

§. I.

OF the numbering and disposing of the host of Israel, for their marches through the Wilderness: with a Note of the reason of their to the worship of God, in the ordering of their Tropa.

§. II. The Offerings of the twelve Princes: The Passover of the second year: The departing of Jethro.

§. III. The voyage from Hor to Kades: the manner by the way: and the cause of their turning back to the Red Sea.

§. IV. Of their unwillingness to return: with the punishment thereof: and of divers accidents in the return.

§. VI. Of their compassing Idumaea, and travelling to Arnon the border of Moab.

§. VII. Of the Bech, of the Battels of the Lord,

The Contents

Lord, mentioned in this Story, and of other Books mentioned in Scripture, which are lost.

§. VIII. Of Moses his sparing the issue of Lot, and of the Giants in those parts: and of Schon and Og.

§. X. Observations out of the Story of Moses, How God disposeth both the smallest occasions and the greatest rebellances, to the effecting of his purpose.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt: And of the men of Renown in other Nations, about the times Of Moses and Josua: with the sum of the History of Josua.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to have war, were divers water: as it were prepared to be their Enemies.

§. II. Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the Ancient wars of the Israelites.

§. III. Of the Amalekites and Ismaelites.

§. IV. Of the insurrection of civillie in Europe about these times; and of Prometheus and Atlas.

The Wars of the Romans with Antiochus the Great, and his Adherents.

§. I.

What kings of the races of Seleucus and Ptolemy reigned in Asia and Egypt, before Antiochus the Great.

§. II. The beginning of the great Antiochus his reign. Of Ptolemy Evergetes, and Philopator, Kings of Egypt. War between Antiochus and Philopator. The rebellion of Malo: an expedition of Antiochus against him: The continuance of Antiochus his Egyptian war, with the passages between the two Kings: The victory of Ptolemy, and peace concluded. Of Achæans, and his rebellion; his greatness, and his fall. Antiochus his expedition against the Carthians, Bactrians, and Indians: some part of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the great Alexander.

§. III. The last reign of Ptolemy Philopator in Egypt: with the tragical end of his Favourite, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to war on the young child Ptolemy Epiphanes, the son of Philopator. His irresolution in preparing for divers wars at once: his voyage towards the Hellespont. He seeks to hold amity with the Romans, who make friendly shew to him, intending nevertheless to have war with him. His doings against the Hellespont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrel to him.

§. IV. The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their war with Philip: after which they quarrel with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chased by his enemy, and by the Romans: His flight unto the King Antiochus: the Ætolians murmur against the Romans in Greece. The war of the Romans and Achæans, with Nabis the tyrant of Lacedæmon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace denied to Antiochus by the Romans.

§. V. Of the long wars which the Romans had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Injuries done by Masinissa to the Carthaginians: that sue unto the Romans for justice in vain.

§. VI. The Ætolians labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis to war upon the Romans: by whom they hold themselves wronged and §. IX. The Romans decree war against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, at it were in defence of the Athenians their confederates. How poor the Athenians were at this time, both in quality and estate.

§. X. The Town of Chalcis in Eubœa, taken and sackt by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by surprize: wasteth the Countrey about; and makes a journey into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, and his wife, Philip offers to make war against Nabis for the Achæans. He returneth home through Attica, which he spoyleth again: and provokes against the enemies. Some exploits of the Romanes. Divers Princes join with them. Great labouring to draw the Ætolians into the war.

§. XI. The meeting of Philip with the Romanes, and skirmishing with them and his borders. The Ætolians invade his Dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman fleet.

§. XII. Villius the Roman Consul wastes a year to no effect. War of the Gauls in Italy. An Embasse of the Romanes to Carthage. Masinissa and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdoms, and T. Quintius Flaminius is sent against him.

§. XIII. The Romans begin to make war by Negotiation. T. Quintius wins a passage against Philip. The safety wasted by Philip, the Romanes, and Ætolians. The Achæans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treaty of peace, that was vain. Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into league with the Romans.

§. XIV. The battell at Cynosephale, wherein Philip was vanquished by T. Quintius.

§. XV. T. Quintius falls out with the Ætolians, and grants truce unto Philip, upon conditions, upon which the peace is ratified. Liberty proclaimed unto the Greeks. The Romans quarrel with Antiochus.

and disgraced. Nabis besiegeth Gytheum, and mastersome part of Achaë. The exact skill of Philopœmen in his advantage of ground; whereby he utterly vanquished Nabis. Antiochus being denied peace by the Romans, joins with the Ætolians. The Ætolians surprize Demetrius; and by killing Nabis, their Confederates seize upon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at Philopœmen his persuasions annex themselves to the Achæans.

§. VII. Antiochus persuaded by Thoas the Ætolian, comes over into Greece, all attended, sundry passages between him, the Ætolians, Chalcidians, and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Isle of Eubœa. The vanity of the Kings Embassadors, and the Ætolians: with the civil answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achæans. That it concerned the Greeks to have desired peace between the Romans and Antiochus: as the best assurance of their own liberty. Of many petty Estates, that fell to the Kings of Amalinder and an idle vanity, by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal gives good counsel in vain. Some towns won in Thessaly, the King retires to Chalcis, where he married a young wife, and revells away the rest of Winter, upon the coming of the Roman Consul, all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Ætolians kept the straits of Thermopylae. He is beaten and flees into Asia, leaving all in Greece unto the Victors.

§. VIII. Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius the African his elder brother, for his Lieutenants, is sent into Greece. He grants long truce to the Ætolians, that so he might at leisure passe into Asia, which troublesome business by Sea, and divers fights. An invasion upon Eumenes his Kingdom: with the siege of Pergamus, raised by an handfull of the Achæans. L. Scipio the Consul comes into Asia, where Antiochus most earnestly desires peace, and is denied it. The battell of Magnesia: wherein Antiochus being vanquished, yieldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans used their victory. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous Triumph over Antiochus, is surnamed The African, as his brother was styled, The African.

§. IX. The Ætolians and Gallo-Greeks, vanquished by the Roman Consul Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other Objections) with attempting to have passed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyls Prophecies; the Books of Hermes; and that inscription Simon Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipios: and that beginning and faction among the Roman Nobility.

CHAP. VI.

The second Macedonian War.

§. I.

The condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the war with Antiochus was finished, the Romans quarrell with Philip. They deal insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian being unready for war, obtains peace at Rome, by his son Demetrius; of whom thenceforth he becomes jealous.

§. II. The death of Philopœmen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Military profession is of all other the most unhappy: notwithstanding some examples, which may seem to prove the contrary.

§. III. Philip making provision for war against the Romans, deals hardly with many of his own subjects. His Negotiations with the Bastarnæ. His cruelty. He suspected his son Demetrius, Demetrius accused by his Brother Perseus, and shortly after slain by his Fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his sons death, whom he findeth to have been innocent, and intending to revenge it on Perseus, he dieth.

§. IV. How the Bastarnæ fell upon Dardania. The behaviour of Perseus in the beginning of his reign. Some wars of the Romans: and how they suffered. Mafaniila cruelly to oppress the Carthaginians. They quarrelled with Perseus. They allow not their Confederates to make war without their leave obtained. The treason of Callicrates, whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perseus. His feckly friendship of the Achæans, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romans discover their intent of Warring upon him.

§. V. How Eumenes King of Pergamus was buffed with Pharnaces, the Rhodians, and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and contemns his enemies the Rhodians with the causes thereof. The unusual stoutness of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt upon Eumenes, the brotherly love between Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus his device to poison some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree War against him, and send him defiance, other ther things concerning the justice of this War.

§. VI. The Romans solicit the Greeks to join with them in the war against Perseus. How the Greeks stood affected in that war. The timorousness of Perseus. Martius a Roman Embassador deludes him with the hope of peace. His forces. He takes the field, and wins part of Thessaly. The forces of Licinius the Roman Consul: and what assistance the Romans had in this war. Of Tempe in Thessaly; and what advantages the Macedonian had, or might have had, but lost by his fear. Perseus braves the Romans, fights with them, knows not how to use his victory, sues for peace, and is denied it by the vanquished. Perseus having the worst in a skirmish, forsakes all the Country lying without Tempe. The Ætolians rebel against the Romans, and are victoriously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the war against Perseus. They vex the Greeks their friends: for whose ease the Senate makes provision, having heard their complaints. The flattering Alabandians.

§. VII. Q. Martius the Roman Consul, with extrem difficulty and danger enters into Tempe. The Cowardize of Perseus in abandoning Tempe, the Town of Diem quitted by Martius, repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill success. Martius a cunning and a bad man.

§. VIII. Of L. Æmilius Paulus, the Consul. His journey. He forceth Perseus to discomf. He will not hazard battel with any disadvantage. Of an Eclipse of the Moon. Æmilius his superstitious. The battel of Pydna. Perseus his fight. He forsakes his Kingdom; which hastily yields to Æmilius. Perseus at Samothrace. He yields himself to the Roman Admiral: and is sent prisoner to Æmilius.

§. XI. The war of Antiochus upon Egypt brought to end by the Roman Embassadors.

§. XII. How the Romans were dreadful unto all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Mafaniila, and Cotys. The end of Perseus and his children. The instability of Kingly Estates. The triumphs of Paulus, Antiochus, and Octavius: with the conclusion of the Work.

Upon unfit, and how unworthy a choice I have made of my self, to undertake a Work of this mixture; mine own reason, though exceeding weak, hath sufficiently resolved me. For bad it been begotten then, with my first dawn of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it self to my younger years, and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well have doubted, that the darkness of Age and Death would have covered over both It and Me, long before the performance. For, beginning with the Creation, I have proceeded with the History of the World; and lastly, purposed (some few sallies excepted) to confine my Discourse, with this our renowned Island of Great Britain. I confess that it had better sorted with my disability, the better part of whose times are run out in other travels, to have set together (as I could) the unjointed and scattered frame of our English affairs, than of the Universal: in whom, had there been no other defect (who am all defective) than the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a tempestuous life, drawn on to the very evening ere I began. But those inmost and soul-piercing wounds, which are ever asking while uncured, with the desire to satisfy those few friends, which I have tried by the fire of Adversity; the former enforcing, the later persuading; have caused me to make my thoughts legible, and my self the subject of every Opinion, wise or weak.

To the World I present them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither have others that were (Fortune changing) sped much better in any Age. For Prosperity and Adversity have evermore tyed and untied vulgar affections. And as we see it in Experience, That Dogs do always bark at those they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so it is with the inconsiderate multitude; who, wanting that Vertue which we call Honesty in all men, and that especial gift of G O D, which we call Charity in Christian men; condemn without hearing, and wound without offence given: led therein by uncertain Report only; which His Majesty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all lies. Blame no man (saith Stracides) before thou have enquired the matter; understand first, and then reform righteously. Rumor, res sine Teste, sine Judice, maligna, fallax; Rumour is without Wits, without Judge, malicious, and deceivable. This vanity of vulgar Opinion it was, that gave S. Augustine Argument to affirm, That he feared the praise of good men, and detested that of the evil. And herein no man hath given a better Rule, than this of Seneca; Conscientiæ satisfaciāmus; nihil in famam laboremus, sequatūr vel mala, dum bene merearis; Let us satisfy our own Consciences, and not trouble our selves with fame; be it never so ill, it is to be despised, so we deserve well.

For my self, if I have in any thing served my Countrey, and prized it before my private: the general acceptation can yield me no other profit at this time, than doth a fair Sun-shine day to a Sea-man after Shipwreck; and the contrary no other harm, than an outrageous tempest after the Port attained. I know that I lost the love of many, for my fidelity towards Her whom I must still honour in the dust; though further than the defence of Her excellent Person, I never persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what device they did it, He that is the Supreme Judge of all the World, hath taken the account: so as for this kind of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parva, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that have made themselves Fathers of that fame, which hath been begotten for them; I can neither envy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine own mis-hap in that kind; but content my self to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour other satisfaction, were an effect of phrenzie, not of hope, seeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can travel the World without a Pass-port. For were it otherwise; and were there not as many internal forms of the mind, as there are external figures of men; there were then some possibility to persuade by the mouth of one Advocate, even Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying, and extensive vertue of dead Earth, and of that breath-giving life which God hath cast upon slime and dust, as that among those that were, of whom we read and hear; and among those that are, whom we see and converse with; every one hath received a several Picture of face, and every one a divers Picture of mind; every one a form a-part, every one a fancy and cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth, as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh, that there is found so great diversity of Opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations: so many natural and unnatural; wise, foolish, manly, and childish affections and passions in mortal men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of Plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the form internal.

And though it pleased God to reserve the Art of reading mens thoughts to himself; yet, as the fruit tells the name of the Tree; so do the outward works of men (so far as their cogitations are acted) give us whereof to guess at the rest. Nay, it were not hard to express the one by the other, very near the life, did not craft in many, fear in the most, and the World's love in all, teach every capacity, according to the compass it hath, to qualifie and mask over their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam suam residunt, quibus veritas non subest: No man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behaviour; the things that are forced for pretences, having no ground of truth, cannot long dissemble their own natures. Neither can any man (saith Plutarch) so change himself, but that his heart may be sometimes seen at his tongues end.

In this great discord, and dissimilitude of reasonable Creatures, if we direct our selves to the Multitude; Omnes honestæ rei malis Judex est vulgus: The common People are evil Judges of honest things, and whose Wisdom (saith Ecclesiastes) is to be despised: if

to the better sort; every understanding hath a peculiar judgment, by which it both censureth other men, and valueth it self. And therefore unto me it will not seem strange, though I find these my worthless Papers torn with Rats; seeing the slothfull Censurers of all Ages have not feared to tax the Reverend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition; the severest men to themselves, with Hypocrisie; the greatest lovers of Justice, with Popularity; and those of the truest Valour and Fortitude, with Vain-glory. But of these natures, which lie in wait to find fault, and to turn good into evil, seeing Solomon complained long since; and that the very Age of the World renders it every day after other more malicious; I must leave the Professors to their easie ways of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility.

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common and approved custom of those, who have left the memories of Time-past to after-Ages; to give, as near as I can, the same right to History which they have done. Yet, seeing therein I should but borrow other mens words; I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is, that among many other benefits, for which it hath been honoured; in this one it triumpheth over all humane knowledge, That it hath given us life in our understanding, since the World it self had life and beginning, even to this day; yea, it hath triumphed over time, which, besides it, nothing but eternity hath triumphed over: for it hath carried our knowledge over the vast and devouring space of many thousands of years, and given so fair and piercing eyes to our mind; that we plainly behold living now (as if we had lived then) that great world, Magni Dei sapiens opus. The wise work (saith Hermes) of a great God, as it was then, when but new to it self. By it (I say) it is, that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed; how it was covered with waters, and again re-peopled; how Kings and Kingdoms have flourished and fallen, and for what vertue and piety God made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the least debt we owe unto History, that it hath made us acquainted with our dead Ancestors; and, out of the depth and darkness of the earth, delivered us their memory and fame. In a word, we may gather out of History a policy no less wise than eternal; by the comparison and application of other mens fore-passed miseries with our own like errors and ill doings. But it is neither of Examples the most lively instruction, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of future torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupified mindes, as to make us remember, That the Infinite Eye and Wisdom of God doth pierce thorow all our pretences, as to make us remember, That the Justice of God doth require none other accuser, than our own consciences; which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formality, which (to pacifie the Opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, cover from his knowledge. And so much did that heathen Wisdom confess, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God: If any (saith Euripides) having in his life committed wickedness, think he can hide it from the everlasting gods, he thinks not well.

To repeat GODS Judgments in particular, upon those of all degrees, which have played with his Mercies, would require a Volume a-part: for the Sea of Examples hath no bottom. The marks, set on private men, are with their bodies cast into the Earth; and their fortunes written only in the memories of those that lived with them: so as they who succeeded, and have not seen the fall of others, do not fear their own faults. GODS Judgments upon

The Preface.

For seeing the first Books of the following Story, have undertaken the Discourse of the first Kings and Kingdoms : and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface to travel after, and over-take far-off Antiquity, and to judge of it ; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath been gathered by our own Kings, and their Neighbour Princes ; who having bebold, both in divine and humane letters, the success of infidelity, injustice, and cruelty ; have (notwithstanding) planted after the same pattern.

True it is, that the judgments of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred up alike with examples of like nature: But every one is toucht most with that which most nearly seemeth to touch his own private; Or otherwise best judgeth with his apprehension. But the judgments of GOD are for ever unchangeable; neither is he wearied by the long process of time, and won to give his blessing in one Age, to that which he hath curst in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisdom, if it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to discern the bitter fruits of irreligious policy, as well among those examples that are found in Ages removed farr from the present, as in those of later times. And that it may no less appear by evident proof, than by asseveration, That ill-doing hath always been attended with ill success; I will here, by way of Preface,

Among our Kings of the Norman Race, we have no sooner pass'd over the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods Justice, upon the children of Henry the First. For that King, when by force, craft, and cruelty, he had dispossess'd, over-reach'd, and lastly made blind, and destroyed his eldest Brother, Robert, Duke of Normandy, to make his own Sons Lords of the Land; GOD cast them all, Male and Female; Nephews and Nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottom of the Sea, with above an hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the Kings dearly beloved.

This cruelty, the secret and unsearchable Judgment of GOD, revenged on the Grand-child of Edward the Third; and so it fell out, even to the last of that Line, that in the second or third descent, they were all buried under the ruines of those stouff buildings, of which the Mortar had been tempered with innocent blood. For Richard the Second, who saw both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with divers others of his Counsellors, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet he always took himself for over-wise, to be taught by examples. The Earls of Huntington and Kent, Montagu and Spencer, who thought themselves as great Politicians in those days, as others have done in these; hoping to please the King, and to secure themselves by the murder of Gloucester; died soon after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and far more shamefully than did that Duke. And as for the King himself, who, in regard of many deeds, unworthy of his Greatness, cannot be excused, as the disavowing himself by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons and Patents: he was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his Cousin-Germans and Vassals, Henry of Lancaster, afterwards Henry the Fourth.

This King, whose Title was weak, and his obtaining the Crown treacherous; who brake faith with the Lords at his landing, protesting to intend only the recovery of his proper inheritance, brake faith with Richard himself, and brake faith with all the Kingdom in Parliament, to whom he swore, that the deposed King should live. After he had enjoyed this Realm some few years, and in that time had been set upon on all sides by his Subjects, and never free from Conspiracies and Rebellions: he saw (if Souls immortal see and discern any things after the Bodies Death) his Grand-child Henry the

the Sixth, and his Son the Prince, suddenly, and without mercy, murdered; the possession of the Crown (for which he had caused so much blood to be poured out) transferred from his Race, and by the Issues of his enemies worn and enjoy'd; enemies, whom, by his own practice, he supposed that he had left no less powerless, than the succession of the Kingdom questionable, by entailing the same upon his own Issues by Parliament. And, of doubt, humane reason could have judged no otherwise, but that these cautious provisions of the Father, seconded by the valour and signal victories of his Son Henry the Fifth, had buried the hopes of every Comptitor, under the despair of all re-conquest and recovery. I say, that humane reason might so have judged, were not this passage of Caulabon also true; Dies, hora, momentum; overcandis dominationibus sufficit, quæ Adamantinis credebantur radicibus esse fundatæ; A day, an hour, a moment, is enough to overturn the things that seem to have been founded and rooted in Adamant.

Now, for Henry the Sixth, upon whom the greatest storm of his Grand-father's grievous faults fell, as it formerly had done upon Richard, the Grand-child of Edward; although he was generally esteemed for a gentle and innocent Prince, yet, as he refused the Daughters of Armagnac, of the House of Navarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match he might have defended his inheritance in France) and married the Daughter of Anjou (by which he lost all that he had in France) so in consenting to the unworthy death of his Uncle of Gloucester, the main and strong Pillar of the House of Lancaster; He drew on himself and his Kingdom the greatest stain and dishonour, that ever it sustained since the Norman Conquest. Of whom it may truly be said, which a Counsellor of his own spoke of Henry the Third of France, Quil estoit un si gentil Prince; mais son reign est advenu en un si mauvois temps. That he was a very gentle Prince; but his Reign happened in a very unfortunate Season.

It is true, that Buckingham and Suffolk were the practitioners and contrivers of the Duke's death; Buckingham and Suffolk, because the Duke gave instructions to their adherents, which instructions made the Queen but too absolute; the Queen, in respect of her personal wounds, for requiescitur forma, because Gloucester dissuaded her marriage. But the fruit was inferable to the seed; the success to the counsel. For after the cutting down of Gloucester, Suffolk rose up so fast, as he dared to dispute his Rights both by arguments and arms; in which quarrel Suffolk and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their adherents, were opposed. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleased God to strike down York, yet his Son the Earl of March, following the plain path which his Father had trodden out, deposed Henry the Father, and Edward the Son, both of their lives and Kingdoms. And what was the end, not of this pollicick Lady, the Queen, other than this, That she lived to behold the wretched ends of all her practitioners; that she lived to look on, while her Husband the King, and her only Son the Prince, were bewen in sundry; while the Crown was set on her head that did it. She lived to see herself deposed of her estate, and of her nobility; and lastly, her Father, by rendering up the Crown of France, the Earldom of Provence, and other places, for the payment of 50000 crowns for her Ransome, to become a stark Beggar. And thus was the end of that fidelity, which Siracides calleth time, but unrighteous: for other fruit hath it never yielded since the World was.

And now it came to Edward the Fourth's turn (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the Plants of Lancaster were rooted up, one only Earl of Richmond excepted; whom also he had once bought of the Duke of Britain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward such a Plantation, as could any way promise it self stability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld & allowed the slaughter which Gloucester, Dorset, Hastings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his own presence; of which tragical Actions, there was not one that escaped the Judgment of GOD in the same kind. And he, which (besides the execution of his Brother Clarence, for none other offence than he himself had formed in his own imagination) instructed Gloucester to kill Henry the Sixth, his Predecessor; taught him also, by the same art, to kill his own Sons and Successors, Edward and Richard. For, those Kings which have sold the blood of others at a low rate; have but made the Market for their own enemies, to buy of theirs at the same price.

To Edward the Fourth, succeeded Richard the Third, the greatest Master in mischief of all that fore-went him; who, although, for the necessity of his Tragedy, he had more parts to play, and more to perform in his own Person, than all the rest; yet he so well fitted every affection that plaid with him, as if each of them had but acted his own interest. For he wrought so cunningly upon the affections of Hastings and Buckingham, enemies to the Queen, and to all her Kindred, as he easily allured them to consend, that Rivers and Grey, the Kings Maternal Uncle and half Brother, should (for the first) be severed from him: Secondly, he wrought their consent to have them imprisoned: And lastly (for the avoiding of future inconvenience) to have their Heads severed from their Bodies. And having now brought those his chief instruments to exercise that common Precept, which the Devil hath written upon every Post, namely, To depress those whom they had grieved, and to destroy those whom they had depressed; He urged that Argument so far, and so forcibly; as nothing but the death of the young King himself, and of his Brother, could fashion the conclusion. For he caused it to be hammered into Buckingham's head, That, whenever the King or his Brother, should have able years to exercise their power, they would take a most severe revenge of that careless wrong offered to their Uncle and Brother, Rivers and Grey.

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hastings, whose fidelity to his Masters Sons was without suspect; and yet the Devil, who never dissuades by impossibility, taught him to try him. And so he did. But, when he found by Catesby, who sounded him, that he was not so durable, he first resolved to kill him sitting in Council; wherein having failed with his Sword, he set the Hangman upon him, with a weapon of more weight. And because nothing else could move his appetite, he caused his head to be stricken off before he eat his Dinner. A greater Judgment of God, than this upon Hastings, I have never observed in any Story. For, the self-same day that the Earl Rivers, Grey, and others, were (without trial of Law, or offence given) by Hastings advice, executed at Romfret; I say, Hastings himself, in the same day, and (as I take it) in the same hour, in the same lawless manner, had his Head struck off in the Tower of London. But Buckingham lived a while longer; and with an eloquent Oration persuaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their King. And having received the Earldom of Hereford for reward, besides the hope of marrying his Daughter to the Kings onely Son; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and delivered up by his trustiest servant; he had his Head severed from his Body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peers. And what success had Richard himself after all these mischiefs and murders, policies, and counter-policies to Christian Religion; and after such time as with a mercilefs hand he had pressed out the breath of his Nephews and Natural Lords, other than the prosperity of so short a life, as it took end, ere himself could well look over and discern it? the great out-cry of innocent blood obtained at GOD'S hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonour, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruel King, Henry the Seventh cut off; and was therein (no doubt) the immediate instrument of Gods Justice. A politic Prince he was, if ever there were any, who by the engine of his wisdom, beat down and overturned as many strong oppositions, both before and after he wore the Crown, as ever King of England did; I say, by his wisdom, because, as he ever left the reins of his affections in the hands of his profit, so he always weighed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had well observed the proceedings of Loys the Eleventh, whom he followed in all was royal, or royal-like; but he was far more just, and begun not their processes whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could never endure any mediation in rewarding his servants, and therein exceeding wise; for whatsoever himself gave, he himself received back the thanks and the love, knowing it well, that the affections of men (purchased by nothing so readily as by benefits) were trains that better became great Kings, than great Subjects. On the contrary, in whatsoever he grieved his Subjects, he wisely put it off on those that he found fit ministers for such actions. However, the taking off of Stanleys Head, who set the Crown on his, and the death of the young Earl of Warwick, Son to George Duke of Clarence, shews, as the success also did, that he held somewhat of the errors of his Ancestors; for his possession in the first Line ended in his Grand-child, as that of Edward the Third, and Henry the Fourth had done.

Now, for King Henry the Eighth, if all the Pictures and Patterns of a mercilefs Prince were lost in the World, they might all again be painted to the life, out of the Story of this King. For, how many servants did he advance in haste (but for what vertue no man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined again; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others, of more desert, gave he abundant flowers from whence to gather Honey, and in the end of Harvest burnt them in the Hive? How many Wives did he cut off, and cast off as his fancy and affection changed? How many Princes of the blood (whereof some of them for age, could hardly crawl towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles have kept the account) did he execute? yea, in his very death-bed and when he was at the point to give his account to GOD for the abundance of blood already spilt: He imprisoned the Duke of Norfolk the Father; and executed the Earl of Surrey the Son; the one whose deserting he knew not how to value, having never omitted any thing that concerned his own honour, and the Kings service; the other never having committed any thing worthy of his least displeasure; the one exceeding valiant and advised; the other no less valiant than learned, and of excellent hope. But besides the sorrows which he heaped upon the

The Preface.

Fatherless and Widows, at home; and besides the vain enterprises abroad, wherein it is thought that he consumed more treasure, than all our victorious Kings did in their several Conquests; what causeless and cruel wars did he make upon his own Nephew King James the Fifth? What Laws and Wills, did he devise to establish this Kingdom in his own Issues? using his sharpest weapons to cut off, and cut down those Branches, which sprang from the same root that himself did. And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious provisions) it pleased God to take away all his own, without increase; though, for themselves in their severall kinds, all Princes of eminent vertue. For these words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalekites, have been verified upon many others: As thy Sword hath made other women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among other women. And that blood which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold air of Scotland had frozen up in the North, God hath dissolved by the Sun-shine of his grace; from whence his Majesty now living, and long to live, is descended. Of whom I may say it truly, That if all the malice of the World were infused into one eye; yet could it not discern in his life, even to this day, any one of those foul spots, by which the consciences of all the fore-named Princes (in effect) have been defiled; nor any drop of that innocent blood on the Sword of his Justice, with which the most that fore-went him have stained both their hands and fame. And for this Crown of England, it may truly be avowed; that he hath received it even from the Hand of God, and hath staid the time of putting it on, howsoever he were provoked to hasten it; That he never took revenge of any man: that sought to put him beside it; That he refused the assistance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as ever Princes did: That His Majesty entred not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary Gate, which his own right set open; and into which, by a general love and obedience, He was received. And howsoever His Majesty's preceding title to this Kingdom, was preferred by many Princes (witness the Treaty at Cambray in the year 1559.) yet he never pleased to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Predecessor; no, notwithstanding the injury of not being declared Heir, in all the time of her long Reign.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulness to God for the uniting of the Northern parts of Britanny to the South, to wit, of Scotland to England, which, though they were severed, but by small brooks and banks, yet, by reason of the long continued War, and the treacheries exercised upon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely severed. This, I say, is not the least of God's blessings which His Majesty hath brought with him unto this Land; No, put all our petty grievances together, and heap them up to the height, they will appear as a Mole-Hill, compared with the Mountain of this concord. And if all the greatest happiness (Christian Religion excepted) that ever this Kingdom received from God, certainly, the peace between the two Lions of Gold and Gules, and the making them one, doth surely, and during the difference, so often and abundantly shed, the state of England is more invincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies, and conquests. It is true, that hereof we do not yet find the effect. But, had the Duke of Parma, in the year 1588, joined the Army which he commanded, with that of Spain, and landed it on the South-coast; and had His Majesty at the same time declared himself against us in the North, it is easy to divine what had become of the Liberty of England; certainly, we would then, without murmur, have brought this Union a far greater praise than it hath since cost us. It is true, that there was never any Common-weal, or Kingdom in the World, wherein no man had cause to lament. Kings live in the World, and not above it. They are not Infinite, to examine every man's cause, or to relieve every man's wants. And yet, in the later (though to his own prejudice) His Majesty hath had more compassion of other mens necessities, than of his own Coffers. Of whom it may be said, as of Solomon, Dedit Deus Solomoni latitudinem cordis; Which, if other men do not understand with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledg; yet may it be better spoken of His Majesty, than of any King that ever England had; who, as well in divine, as in humane understanding hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

FIN. COMMENT. IN
SOL. 1. R. 9.

I could say much more of the Kings Majesty, without flattery: did I not fear the imputation of presumption, and withall suspect, that it might befall these Papers of mine (though the less were little) as it did the Pictures of Queen Elizabeth, made by unskilfull and common Painters, which, by her own commandment were knock'd in pieces, and cast into the fire. For ill Artists, in setting out the Beauty of the external; and weak Writers, in describing the Vertues of the internal; do often leave to Posterity, of well formed faces, a deformed memory; and of the most Perfect and Princely minds, a most defective Representation. It may suffice, and there needs no other discourse; if the honest Reader but compare the cruel and turbulent passages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom, for that purpose I have inserted this brief Discourse) with His Majesties temperat, revengeless, and liberal disposition; I say, that if the honest Reader weigh them justly, and with an even hand; and withall, bestow every deformed child on his true Parent; He shall find, that there is no man that hath so just a cause to complain, as the King himself hath. Now, as we have told the success of the trumperies, and cruelties of our own Kings, and other great Personages; so we find, that GOD is every where the same God. And, as it pleased him to punish the usurpation and unnatural cruelty of Henry the First, and of our Third Edward, in their Children for many Generations: so dealt he with the Sons of Loys Debonaire, the Son of Charles the Great, or Charlemain: For after such time as Debonaire of France had torn out the eyes of Bernard his Nephew, the Son of Pepin, the eldest Son of Charlemaine, and Heir of the Empire, and then caused him to die in Prison, as did our Henry to Robert his elder Brother; there followed nothing but murders upon murders, poisonings, imprisonments, and civil Warr: till the whole Race of that famous Emperor was extinguished. And though Debonaire, after he had rid himself of his Nephew by a violent death; and of his bastard Brothers by a civil death (having inclosed them with sure guard all the days of their lives, within a Monastery) held himself secure from all opposition; yet God raised up against him (which he suspected not) his own Sons, to vex him, to invade him, to take him prisoner, and to depose him; his own Sons, with whom (to satisfy their ambition) he had shared his estate, and given them Crowns to wear, and Kingdoms to govern, during his own life. Tea, his eldest Son Lothaire (for he had four, three by his first Wife, and one by his second; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cause of his deposition, that he had used violence toward his Brothers and Kinsmen; and that he had suffered his Nephew (whom he might have delivered) to be slain. Eo quod, saith the Text, fratribus & propinquis violentiam intulerit, & nepotem suum, quem ipse liberare poterat, interfici permisit: Because he used violence to his Brothers and Kinsmen, and suffered his Nephew to be slain, whom he might have delivered.

Yet did he that which few Kings do; namely, repent him of his cruelty. For, among many other things which he performed in the General Assembly of the States, it follows: Post hæc autem palam se errasse confessus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodosii exemplum, penitentiam spontaneam suscepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem gesserat: After this, he did openly confes himself to have erred, and following the Example of the Emperor Theodosius, he underwent voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done against Bernard his own Nephew.

This he did, and it was praise-worthy. But the blood that is unjustly spilt, is not again gathered up from the ground by repentance. These Medicines, ministered to the dead, have but dead rewards.

The King, as I have said, had four Sons. To Lothaire his eldest, he gave the Kingdom of Italy; as Charlemaine his Father had done to Pepin, the Father of Bernard, who was to succeed him in the Empire. To Pepin, the second Son, he gave the Kingdom of Aquitaine; to Loys, the Kingdom of Bavier; and to Charles, whom he had by a second Wife, called Judith, the remainder of the Kingdom of France. But his second Wife, being a mother-in-law to the rest, persuaded Debonaire, to cast his Son Pepin out of Aquitaine; thereby to greaten Charles, which, after the death of his Son Pepin, he prosecuted to effect against his Grand-child bearing the same name. In the mean while, being invaded by his Son Loys of Bavier, he dies for grief.

Debonaire dead, Loys of Bavier, and Charles afterwards, called the Bald, and their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, join in league against the Emperor Lothaire their eldest Brother. They fight near to Auxerre, the most bloody battle that ever was stricken in France; in which, the marvellous loss of Nobility, and men of Warr, gave courage to the Saracens to invade Italy; to the Hunns to fall upon Almaine; and the Danes to enter upon Normandy. Charles the Bald by Treason seizeth upon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyster; Carloman rebels against his Father, Charles the bald, the Father burns out the eyes of his Son Carloman; Bavier invades the Emperor Lothaire; his Brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, he is assailed and wounded to the heart by his own conscience; for his Rebellion against his Father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monastery. Charles the bald the Uncle, oppresseth his Nephews, the Sons of Lothaire; he usurpeth the Empire, to the prejudice of Loys of Bavier, his elder Brother; Baviers Armies, and his Son Carloman, are beaten; he dies of grief, and the Usurper Charles is poisoned by Zedechias a Jew, his Physician, his Son Loys le Beque dies of the same drink; Beque had Charles the simple, and two Bastards, Loys and Carloman; they rebel against their Brother; but the eldest breaks his neck, the younger is slain by a wild Boar; the Son of Bavier had the same ill destiny, and brake his neck by a fall out of a Window in sporting with his companions.

The Preface.

Charles the gross becomes Lord of all that the Sons of Debonaire held in Germany; where, with not contented, he invades Charles the simple; but being forsaken of his Nobility, of his Wife, and of his Understanding; he dies a distressed Beggar. Charles the simple is held in Wardship by Eudes, Major of the Palace, then by Robert, the Brother of Eudes; and lastly, being taken by the Earl of Vermandois, he is forced to die in the prison of Peron. Loys the Son of Charles the simple breaks his neck in chasing a Wolf; and of the two Sons of this Loys, the one dies of poison, the other dies in the Prison of Orleans; after whom, Hugh Capet, of another Race, and a stranger to the French, makes himself King.

These miserable ends had the Issues of Debonaire; who after he had once apparelled Injustice with authority, his Sons and Successors took up the fashion, and wore that Garment so long without other provision, as when the same was torn from their shoulders, every man despoiled them as miserable and naked Beggars. The wretched success they had (saith a Learned French-man) shews, Que en ceste mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la justice; That in the death of that Prince; to wit, of Bernard the Son of Pepin, the true Heir of Charlemain, men had more meddling than God or Justice had.

But to come nearer home; it is certain that Francis the First, one of the Worthiest Kings (except for that Fault) that ever the French-men had, did never enjoy himself, after he had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandol, and Cabrieres, to the Parliament of Provence, which poor people were thereupon burnt and murdered; men, women, and children. It is true that the said King Francis repented himself of the fact, and gave charge to Henry his Son, to do Justice upon the murderers, threatening his Son with GODS Judgments, if he neglected it. But this unreasonable care of his, God was not pleased to accept for payment. For after Henry was slain in sport by Montgomery, we all may remember what became of his four Sons, Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which, although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautiful and virtuous Ladies; yet were they, one after another, cast out of the World, without Stock or Seed. And notwithstanding their subtilty, and breach of Faith; with all their Massacres upon those of the Religion, and great effusion of blood, the Crown was set on his Head, whom they all laboured to dissolve; the Protestants remain more in number than ever they were, and hold to this day more strong Cities than ever they had.

Let us now see, if God be not the same God in Spain as in England and France. Towards whom we will look no further back than to Don Pedro of Castile, in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicily, our Richard the Third, and the great Ivan Vasilowitch of Moscovia, were but petty ones; this Castilian, of all the Christian and Heathen Kings, having been the most merciful. For, besides those of his own Blood and Nobility, which he had caused to be slain in his own Court and Chamber, as, Sancho Ruis; the great Master of Calatrava, Ruis Gonfales, Alphonso Tello, and Don John of Arragon, whom he cut in pieces, and cast into the streets, denying him Christian burial: I say, besides these, and the slaughter of Gomes Mauriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great Commander of Castile; he made away the two Infants of Arragon his Cousins Germanians, his Brother Don Frederick, Don John de la Cerda, Albuquerque, Nagues de Guzman, Cornuel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Gutierrez his great Treasurer, and all his his Kinred; and a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest Brothers, innocent Princes, whom after he had kept in close Prison from their Cradles, till one of them had lived sixteen years, and the other fourteen; he murdered them there. Nay, he spared not his Mother, nor his Wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly, as he caused the Arch-bishop of Toledo, and the Dean to be killed, of purpose to enjoy their Treasures; so did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar, King of Barbary, with thirty seven of his Nobility, that came into him for succor, with a great sum of Money, to levy (by his favour) some Companies of Souldiers to return withall. Yea, he would needs assist the Hangman with his own hand, in the execution of the old King; in so much as Pope Urban declareth him an enemy both to God and Man. But what was his end? Having been formerly beaten out of his Kingdom, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster; He was stabbed to death by his younger Brother, the Earl of Altramara, who dispossessed all his Children of their Inheritance, which, but for their Fathers injustice and cruelty, had never been in danger of any such thing.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it must be Duke John of Burgoign, who, after his trayterous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancellor of France, the Bishops of Constance, Bayeux, Euxaux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reverend Church-men, the Earl of Angouleme, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the Officers of Justice of the Chamber of Accounts, Treasury, Requests (with sixteen others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slain. Hereby, while he hoped to govern, and to have mastered France; He was soon after stricken with an Ax in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leisure to repent his misdeeds, presently slain. These were the lovers of other mens miseries; and miseries found them out.

Now, for the Kings of Spain, which lived both with Henry the Seventh, Henry the Eighth, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon, was the first, and the first that laid the foundation of the present Austrian greatness. For this King did not content himself to hold Arragon by the usurpation of his Ancestor; and to fasten thereunto the Kingdom of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his Wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her own Niece, the Daughter of the last Henry; but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, he also cast his own Niece out of the Kingdom of Navarre; and, contrary to Faith, and the Promise he made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted the rest, as there was no means left for any Army to invade it. This King, I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick, Kings of Naples, Princes of his own Blood, and by double alliance tied unto him; sold them to the French; and with the same Army, sent for their succour under Gonzalvo, cast them out; and shared their Kingdom with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wife and politick King, who sold Heaven and his own Honour, to make his Son the Prince of Spain, the greatest Monarch of the World; saw him die in the flower of his years; and his Wife great with child, with her untimely birth, at once and together buried. His eldest Daughter married unto Don Alphonso Prince of Portugal, beheld her first Husband break his neck in her presence; and being with child by her second, died with it. A just Judgment of God upon the Race of Alphonso, now wholly extinguished; who had not only left many many disconsolate Mothers in Portugal, by the slaughter of their children; but had formerly slain with his own hand, the Son and only comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Dutcheß of Viseo. The second Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-Duke Philip, turned fool, and died mad, and deprived. His third Daughter, bestowed on King Henry the Eighth, he saw cast off by the King; the Mother of many troubles in England; and the Mother of a Daughter, that in her unhappy zeal, shed a world of innocent blood; lost Calice to the French; and died heart-broken without increase. To conclude, all those Kingdoms of Ferdinand have masters of a new name; and by a strange Family are governed and possess'd.

Charles the Fifth, Son to the Arch-Duke Philip, in whose vain enterprizes upon the French, upon the Almans and other Princes and States; so many multitudes of Christian Souldiers, and renowned Captains were consumed; who gave the while a most perillous entrance to the Turks, and suffered Rhodes, the Key of Christendom, to be taken; was in conclusion chased out of France, and in a sort, out of Germany; and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, stole away from Insburg; and scaled the Alpes by torch-light, pursued by Duke Maurice; having hoped to swallow up all those Dominions; wherein he concerted nothing, save his own disgraces. And having after the slaughter of so many Millions of men, no one foot of ground in either, He crept into a Cloyster, and made himself a Pensioner of an hundred thousand Duckets by the year, to his Son Philip, from whom he very slowly received his mean and ordinary maintenance.

Netherlands.

His Son again, King Philip the Second, not satisfied to hold Holland and Zeland, (wrested by his Ancestors from Jaqueline, their lawfull Princeß) and to possess in peace many other Provinces of the Netherlands; persuaded by that mischievous Cardinal of Granville, and other Romish Tyrants; not only forgot the most remarkable services, done to his Father the Emperor, by the Nobility of those Countreys, not only forgot the Present made him upon his entry of forty Millions of Florens, called the Novaille aid; nor only forgot that he had twice most solemnly sworn to the General States, to maintain and preserve their antient Rights, Privileges, and Customs, which they had enjoyed under their thirty and five Earls before him, Conditional Princes of those Provinces, but beginning first to constrain them, and enthrall them by the Spanish Inquisition, and then to impoverish them by many new devised and intollerable Impositions, he lastly, by strong hand and main force, attempted to make himself not only an absolute Monarch over them, like unto the Kings and Sovereigns of England and France; but Turk-like, to tread under his feet all their Natural and Fundamental Laws, Privileges, and antient Rights. To effect which, after he had easily obtain from the Pope a dispensation of his former Oaths (which Dispensation was the true cause of the Warr and Bloodshed since then;) and after he had tried what he could perform, by dividing of their own Nobility, under the Government of his base Sister, Margaret of Austria, and the Cardinal Granville; He employed that most merciles Spaniard, Don Ferdinand Alvarez of Toledo, Duke of Alva, followed with a powerful Army of strange Nations; by whom he first slaughtered that renowned Captain, the Earl of Egmont, Prince of Gavare; and Philip Montmorency, Earl of Horn; made away Montigue, and the Marquess of Bergues, and cut off in those six years (that Alva Governed) of Gentlemen and

and others, eighteen thousand and six hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, besides all his other barbarous murders and massacres. By whose ministry, when he could not yet bring his affairs to their wished ends, having it in his hope to work that by subtilty which he had failed to perform by force, He sent for Governour, his bastard Brother, Don John of Austria; a Prince of great hope, and very gracious to those people. But he, using the same Papal advantage that his Predecessors had done, make no scruple to take Oath upon the holy Evangelists, to observe the Treaty made with the General States; and to discharge the Low-Countreys of all Spaniards, and other strangers therein garrisoned; Towards whose Pay and Passport, the Netherlands strained themselves to make a payment of 600000. pounds. Which Moneys received, he suddenly surpris'd the Citadels of Antwerp and Nemures, not doubting (being unsuspected by the States) to have possess'd himself of all the mastering places of those Provinces. For whatsoever he overtly pretended, he held in secret a contrary counsel with the Secretary Elcovedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, and others, Ministers of the Spanish Tyranny formerly praesided, and now again intended. But let us now see the effect and end of this perjury, and of all other the Duke's cruelties. First, for himself; after he had murdered so many of the Nobility; executed (as aforesaid) eighteen thousand six hundred in six years, and most cruelly slain Man, Woman, and Child in Mecklin, Zutphen, Narden, and other places; and after he had consumed six and thirty Millions of treasure in six years, notwithstanding his Spanish vaunt, That he would suffocate the Holanders in their own Butter-barrels, and Milk-tubs; He departed the Countrey no otherwise accompanied, than with the curse and detestation of the whole Nation; leaving His Majesties Affairs in a ten-fold worse estate than he found them at his first arrival. For Don John, whose haughty conceit of himself overcame the greatest difficulties; though his judgment were over-weak, to manage the least: What wonders did his fearful breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his Brothers jealousy and distrust, with the untimely death that seized on him, even in the flower of his youth? And for Elcovedo his sharp-tongued Secretary, who in his own imagination had conquered for his Master, both England and the Netherlands; being sent into Spain upon some new project, he was at the first arrival, and before any access to the King, by certain Russians, appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his own lodging. Lastly, if we consider the King of Spain's carriage, his counsel and success in this business, there is nothing left in the memory of Man more remarkable. For he hath paid above an hundred Millions, and the lives of above four hundred thousand Christians, for the loss of all those Countreys, which, for beauty, gave place to none; and for revenue, did equal his West-Indies; for the loss of a Nation which most willingly obeyed him; and who, on this day, after forty years Warr, are, in despite of all his forces, become a free Estate, and far more rich and powerfull than they were, when he first began to impoverish and oppress them.

Oh! by what plots, by what for-swearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poisonings, and under what reasons of State, and politick subtilty, have these fore-named Kings, both strangers, and of our own Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD upon themselves, upon theirs, and upon their prudent ministers! and in the end, have brought those things to pass for their enemies, and seen an effect so directly contrary to all their own counsels and and cruelties; as the one could never have hoped for themselves; and the other never have succeeded; if no such opposition had ever been made. G O D hath said it, and performed it ever: Perdam sapientiam sapientum; I will destroy the wisdom of the wise.

But what of all this? and to what end do we lay before the eyes of the living, the fall and fortunes of the dead; seeing the world is the same that it hath been; and the children of the present time, will still obey their Parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the World are exercised. To hold the times we have, we hold all things lawfull; and either we hope to hold them for ever; or at least we hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For, as we are content to forget our own experience, and to counterfeit the ignorance of our own knowledge, in all things that concern our selves; or persuade our selves, that G O D hath given us Letters Patents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a Non obstante: so we neither look behind us what hath been, nor before us what shall be. It is true, that the quantity which we have, is of the body: we are by it joined to the earth; we are compounded of earth; and we inhabit it. The Heavens are high, farr off, and unsearchable; we have sense and feeling of corporal things; and of eternal grace, but by revelation. No marvel then that our thoughts are also earthly; and it is less to be wondered at, that the words of wortble's men cannot cleanse them; seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose understanding the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to inhabit, have not performed it. For, as the Prophet Esay cried out long ago, Lord, who hath believed our reports? And out of doubt, as Esay complained then for himself and others: so are they less believed, every day after other. For, although Religion; and the truth thereof, be in every man's mouth, yea, in the discourse of every woman, who, for the greatest number are but Idols of Vanity; what is it other than an universal dissimulation? We profess that we know G O D, but by works we deny him. For Beatitude doth not consist in the knowledge of divine things, but in a divine life; for the Devils know them better than men. Beatitude non est divinarum cognitio, sed vita divina. And certainly, there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented; than the private contention, the passionate dispute, the personal hatred, and the perpetual warr, massacres, and murders, for Religion among Christians; the discourse whereof hath so occupied the World, as it hath well near driven the practice thereof out of the World. Who would not soon resolve, that took knowledge but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their lives which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heaven; and that the World is self were but used as it ought, and as an Inn, or place wherein to repose our selves in passing on towards our Celestial habitation? when on the contrary, besides the Discourse and outward profession, the Soul hath nothing but hypocrisie. We are all (in effect) become Comedians in Religion; and while we act in gesture and voice, divine virtues, in all the course of our lives, we renounce our Persons, and the parts we play. For Charity, Justice, and Truth, have but their being in tearms, like the Philosophers Matoria prima.

Neither is it that wisdom, which Solomon defineth to be the School-Mistress of the Knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the World; it is enough that we give it our good word: but the same which is altogether exercised in the service of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchase and obtain honour, with the many respects

which attend it. These indeed be the marks, which (when we have bent our consciences to the highest) we all shoot at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our own; the care our own in this life, the peril our own in the future; and yet, when we have gathered the greatest abundance, we our selves enjoy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest, He that had the greatest wisdom, and the greatest ability, that ever man had, hath told us, that this is the use: When goods increase (saith Solomon) they also increase that eat them; and what good cometh to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that devour the rest, and follow us in fair weather; they again forsake us in the first tempest of misfortune, and steer away before the Sea and Wind; leaving us to the malice of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand Examples, I will take but one out of Master Danner, and use his own words: Whilest the Emperor Charles the Fifth, after the resignation of his estates, stayed at Uloping for Wind, to carry him his last journey into Spain; He conferred on a time with Seldius, his Brother Ferdinand's Embassador, till the deep of the night. And when Seldius should depart; the Emperor calling for some of his servants, and no body answering him, (for those that attended upon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest asleep) the Emperor took up the Candle himself, and went before Seldius, to light him down the Stairs; and so did, notwithstanding all the resistance that Seldius could make. And when he was come to the Stairs foot, he said thus unto him; Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperor, when he shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast known in thy time environed with so many mighty Armies and Guards of Souldiers, thou hast also seen alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea, even of his own servants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of G O D, which I will by no means go about to withstand.

But you will say, that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first is, the reverend respect that is held of Great Men, and the Honour done unto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward love for their Justice and Piety, accompany the outward worship given to their places and power; without which, what is the applause of the Multitude, but as the out-cry of an Herd of Animals, who, without the knowledge of any true cause, please themselves with the noise they make? For, seeing it is a thing exceeding rare to distinguish Virtue and Fortune; the most impious (if prosperous) have ever been applauded; the most virtuous (if unprosperous) have ever been despised. For, as Fortunes man rides the Horse, so Fortune herself rides the Man. Who, when he is descended, and on foot; the Man taken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base Groom beats the one, and a bitter contempt spurs at the other, with equal liberty.

The second is, the greatness of our Posterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom we leave behind us. Certainly, of those which conceive that their Souls departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be said of them, which Lactantius spake of certain Heathen Philosophers; Quod sapientes sunt in re stultia. For, when our spirits immortal shall be once separate from our mortal bodies, and disposed by G O D; there remaineth in them no other joy of their Posterity which succeed, than there doth of pride in that stone, which sleepeth in the Wall of a King's Palace, nor any other sorrow for their poverty, than there doth of shame

shame in that, which beareth up a Beggars cottage. Nesciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt vivi, etiam eorum filii, quia animæ mortuorum rebus viventium non intersunt; The dead, though holy, know nothing of the living, no, not of their own children; for the Souls of those departed, are not conversant with their affairs that remain. And if we doubt of Saint Augustine, we cannot of Job; who tells us, That we know not if our Sons shall be honourable; neither shall we understand concerning them, whether they shall be of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confirmeth; Man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth himself in vain; he heareth up riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The living (saith he) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all; for, who can shew unto man, what shall be after him under the Sun? He therefore accounteth it among the rest of worldly vanities, to labour and travel in the World; not knowing after death, whether a fool or a wise man should enjoy the fruits thereof; which made me (saith he) endeavour even to abhor mine own labour. And what can other men hope, whose blessed or sorrowfull estates after death, God hath reserved? Mans knowledge lying but in his hope, seeing the Prophet Esay confesseth of the Elect, That Abraham is ignorant of us, and Israel knows us not. But hereof we are assured, that the long and dark night of death of whose following day we shall never behold the dawn till his return that hath triumphed over it) shall cover us over till the world be no more. After which, and when we shall again receive Organs glorified, and incorruptible, the seats of Angelical affections; in so great admiration shall the Souls of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or less joy; nor any return of forgone and mortal affection towards Friends, Kinred, or Children. Of whom, whether we shall retain any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them, no man can assure us; and the wisest men doubt. But on the contrary; If a divine life retain any of those faculties, which the Soul exercised in a mortal body; we shall not at that time so divide the joys of Heaven, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of their felicitous which remain in the World. No, be their estates greater than ever the World gave, we shall (by the difference known unto us) even detest their consideration. And whatsoever comfort shall remain of all forepast, the same will consist in the charity, which we exercised living: and in that Piety, Justice, and firm Faith, for which it pleased the Infinite Mercy of God to accept of us, and receive us. Shall we therefore value honour and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as unnecessary and vain? Certainly, no. For that Infinite Wisdom of God, which hath distinguished his Angels by degrees; which hath given greater and less light and beauty to heavenly bodies; which hath made differences between Beasts and Birds; created the Eagle, and the Flie, the Cedar, and the Shrub; and among Stones, given the fairest tincture to the Ruby, and quickest light to the Diamond; hath also ordained Kings, Dukes, or Leaders of the people; Magistrates, Judges, and other degrees among men. And, as Honour is left to Posterity, for a mark and ensign of the vertue and understanding of their Ancestors; so (seeing Socrates preferred Death before Beggary; and, that Titus, without proportionable estates, fall under the miserable succour of other mens pity) I account it foolishness to condemn such a care; Provided, that worldly goods be well gotten, and that we raise not our own buildings

out of other mens ruines. For, as Plato doth first preferre the perfection of bodily health; secondly, the form and beauty; and thirdly, Divitiæ nulla fraude quæsitæ: so Jeremy cries, Wo unto them that erect their houses by unrighteousness, and their chambers without equity; And Esay the same, Wo to those that spoil, and were not spoiled. And it was out of the true wisdom of Solomon, that he commandeth us, not to drink the Wine of violence; not to lie in wait for blood; and not to swallow them up alive, whose riches we covet; for such are the ways (saith he) of every one that is greedy of gain.

And, if we could afford our selves but so much leisure, as to consider, That he which hath most in this world, hath, in respect of the world, nothing in it; and that he which hath the longest time lent him to live in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past, when we were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we shall abide for ever; I say, if both, to wit, our proportion in the World, and our time in the World, differ not much from that which is nothing, it is not out of any excellency of understanding, that we so much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being; and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending; coveting those mortal things of the World, as if our Souls were therein immortal, and neglecting those things which are immortal, as if our selves, after the World, were but mortal.

But let every man value his own wisdom, as he pleaseth. Let the rich man think all fools, that cannot equal his abundance; the Revenger esteem all negligent, that have not trodden down their opposites; the Politician all gross, that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet, when we once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all winds drive us, and when, by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can never be weighed again, the navigation of this life takes end; Then it is, I say, that our own cogitations (those sad and severe cogitations, formerly beaten from us by our Health and Felicity) return again, and pay us to the uttermost for all the pleasing passages of our lives past. It is then that we cry out to God for mercy; then, when our selves can no longer exercise cruelty, to others; and it is only then, that we are stricken through the Soul with this terrible Sentence, That God will not be mocked. For if, according to S. Peter, The righteous scarcely be saved; and that God spared not his Angels; where shall those appear, who, having served their appetites all their lives, presume to think, that the severe Commandments of the All-powerfull God were given but in sport; and that the short breath, which we draw when death presseth us, if we can but fashion it to the sound of Mercy (without any kind of satisfaction or amends) is sufficient? O quam multi, saith a reverend Father, cum hac spe ad æternos labores & bella descendunt! I confess, that it is a great comfort to our friends, to have it said, That we ended well: for we all desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But, what shall we call a dis-esteeming, an opposing, or (indeed) a mocking of God; if those men do not oppose him, dis-esteem him, and mock him, that think it enough for God, to ask him forgiveness at leisure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breath? For, what do they otherwise, that die this kind of well-dying, but say unto God, as followeth? We beseech thee, O God, that all the falsehoods, swearings, and treacheries of our lives past, may be pleasing unto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that have had no leisure to do any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a just God;

that thou wilt love injuries and oppressions, call ambition wisdom, and charity foolishness. For I shall prejudice my Son (which I am resolved not to do) if I make restitution; and confess my self to have been unjust (which I am too proud to do) if I deliver the oppressed. Certainly, these wise worldlings have either found out a new God, or made One; and in all likelihood, such a Lenden One, as Lewis the Eleventh wore in his Cap; which, when he had caused any that he feared or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head, and kiss it; beseeching it to pardon him this one evil act more, and it should be the last; which (as at other times) he did, when by the practice of a Cardinal, and a falsified Sacrament, he caused the Earl of Armagnac to be stabbed to death; mockeries indeed, fit to be used towards a Lenden; but not towards the Everliving G O D. But of this composition are all devout lovers of the World, that they fear all that is dureless and ridiculous; they fear the plots and practices of their opposites, and their very whisperings; they fear the Opinions of men, which beat but upon shadows; they flatter and forsake the prosperous and unprosperous, be they Friends or Kings; yea, they drive under water, like Ducks, at every pebble-stone, that is but thrown towards them by a powerful hand; and on the contrary, they shew an obstinate and Giant-like valour against the terrible judgments of the All-powerfull God; yea, they shew themselves Gods against God, and Slaves towards men; towards men, whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now, for the rest; If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poor and oppressed, whom we account wretched; we shall find the happiness of the one, and the miserable estate of the other, so tied by God to the very instant, and both so subject to enterchange (witness the sudden downfall of the greatest Princes, and the speediest uprising of the meanest persons) as the one hath nothing so certain, whereof to boast; nor the other so uncertain, whereof to bewail itself. For, there is no man so assured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life; but that he may be deprived of either, or all, the very next hour, or day to come. Quid vespere vehat, incertum est; What the evening will bring with it, it is uncertain. And yet ye cannot tell (saith St. James) what shall be to-morrow. To day he is set up, and to-morrow he shall not be found; for he is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth. And although the air which compasseth adversity, be very obscure; yet therein we better discern God than in that shining light which environeth worldly glory, through which, for the cloudiness thereof, there is no vanity which escapeth our sight. And let adversity seem what it will, to happy men ridiculous, who make themselves merry at other mens misfortunes; and to those under the cross, grievous: yet this is true. That for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equal to either. For, be it that we have lived many years, and (according to Solomon) in them all we have rejoiced; or be it that we have measured the same length of days, and therein have evermore sorrowed; yet, looking back from our present being, we find both the one and the other; to wit, the joy and mo, sailed out of sight; and death, which doth pursue us, and hold us in chace, from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid erat is retro est, mors tenet. Whatsoever of our age is past, death holds it. So, as whosoever he be, to whom Fortune hath been a servant, and the Time a friend; let him but take the account of his memory (for we have no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what he hath reserved, either of Beauty and Youth, or fore-gone delights; what it hath saved, that it might last, of his dearest affections, or of whatever else the amorous Spring-time gave his thoughts of contentment, then unvaluable; and he shall find that all the Art which his elder years have, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heavy, secret, and sad sighs. He shall find nothing remaining, but those sorrows, which grow up after our fast-springing youth, over-take it, when it is at a stand; and over-top it utterly, when it begins to wither; in so much as looking back from the very instant time, and from our now being, the poor, diseased, and captive creature, hath as little sense of all his former miseries and pains, as he, that is most blessed in common Opinion, hath of his fore-passed pleasure and delights. For whatsoever is cast behind us, is just nothing; and what is to come, deceitfull hope hath it: Omnia quæ even-tura sunt, in incerto jacent. Only those few black Swans I must except; who, having had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their own price; do, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well-acted life, behold death without dread, and the grave without fear, and embrace both, as necessary guides to endless glory.

For my self, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrows of this life are but of two sorts; whereof the one hath respect to G O D; the other to the World. In the first, we complain to G O D against our selves, for our offences against him; and confess, Ectru justus es in omnibus quæ vehenerunt super nos; And thou, O Lord, art just in all that hath befallen us. In the second, we complain to our selves against G O D; as if he had done us wrong, either in not giving us worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites; or for taking them from us having had them; forgetting that humble and just acknowledgment of Job, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken. To the first of which, S. Paul hath promised blessedness; to the second, death. And out of doubt, he is either a fool, or ingratefull to G O D; or both, that doth not acknowledge how mean soever his estate be, that the same is yet far greater, than that which God oweth him; or doth not acknowledge how sharp soever his afflictions be, that the same are yet far less, than those which are due unto him. And if an Heathen wise man call the adversities of the World but tributa vivendi; the tributes of living; a wise Christian man ought to know them, and bear them as the tributes of offending. He ought to bear them man-like, and resolutely, and not as those whining Souldiers do, Qui gementes sequuntur Imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our Tragedies, hath written out for us, and appointed us all the parts we are to play; and hath not, in their distribution, been partial to the most mighty Princes of the World; That gave unto Darius the part of the greatest Emperor; and the part of the most miserable Beggar; a Beggar, begging Water of an Enemy to quench the great drought of death; That appointed Bajazet to play the Grand Seigneur of the Turks in the morning, and in the same day, the Footstool of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had also played, being taken by Saporess) that made Bellisarius play the most victorious Captain, and lastly, the part of a blind Beggar; of which, examples of many thousands may be produced: why should other men, who are but as the least Worms, complain of wrongs? Certainly, there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous World, than to resolve, That the change of Fortune on the great Theatre, is but as the change of Garments on the less. For, when on the one and the other, every man wears but his own skin, the Players are all alike. Now, if any man out of weakness prize the passages of this world otherwise (for, saith Petrarch, Magni ingenii est revocare mentem a sensibus) it is by reason of that unhappy fantasie of ours, which forgeth in the brains of Man all the miseries (the corporal excepted) whereunto he is subject. Therein it is, that Misfortune and Adversity work all that they work. For, seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatsoever Fortune or Force takes from any one; it were a foolish madnes in the shipwrack of worldly things, where all sinks but the Sorrow, to save it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortunæ succumbere, quod tristius est omni fato; To fall under Fortune, of all other, the most miserable destiny.

But it is now time to found a retreat, and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit; and withall, that the good intent, which hath moved me to draw the Picture of time past (which we call History) in so large a Table, may also be accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of divine Providence, every where found (the first divine Histories being nothing else but a continuation of such examples) have persuaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For, though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so near, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implieth the other; Creation inferring Providence (for what father forsaketh the child that he hath begotten?) and Providence presupposing Creation; Yet many of those that have seemed to excel in worldly wisdom, have gone about to dis-join this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Providence, but granting that the World had a beginning; the Aristotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now, although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for, by Faith, we understand that the World was made by the Word of God) be too weighty a work for Aristotle's rotten ground to bear up, upon which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the Defences and Fortresses of all his Verbal Doctrine; yet that the necessity of Infinite power, and the World's beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary, even in the judgment of Natural reason, wherein he believed, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be marvelled at. And it is no less strange, that those men which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this main point; and taught little other than tearms in the rest) have so retrench'd their minds from the following and overtaking of Truth, and so absolutely subjected themselves to the law of those Philosophical Principles; as all contrary kind of teaching, in the search of causes, they have condemned, either for phantastical, or curious. But doth it follow, that the Positions of Heathen Philosophers are undoubtedly Grounds and Principles indeed, because so called? Or, that ipsi dixerunt, doth make them to be such? Certainly no. But this is true, That where natural reason hath built any thing so strong against it self, as the same reason can hardly assail it, much less batter it down: the same in every question of Nature, and infinite power, may be approved for a fundamental Law of humane knowledge. For, saith Charron, in his Book of Wisdom, Tout proposition humaine a autant d'authorité quel'autre, si la raison n'en fait la différence; Every humane proposition hath equal authority, if reason make not a difference: the right being but the Fables of Principles. But hereof, how shall the upright and impartial judgment of man give a Sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to give in evidence? And, to this purpose, it was well said of Lactantius, Sapientiam sibi adimunt, qui sine ullo judicio inventa majorum probant, & ab aliis pecudum more ducuntur; They neglect their own wisdom, who without any judgment approve the invention of those that fore-went them; and suffer themselves, after the manner of Beasts, to be led by them. By the advantage of which sloth and dulness, ignorance is now become so powerfull a Tyrant, as it hath set true Philosophy, Physick and Divinity in a Pillory; and written over the first, Contra negantem principia; over the second, Virtus specifica; and over the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for myself, I shall never be persuaded, that God hath shut up all the light of Learning within the Lamborn of Aristotle's brains; or, that it was ever said unto him, as unto Elfdraas, Accendam in corde tuo Lucernam intellectus; That God hath given invention but to the Heathen, and that they onely invaded Nature, and found the strength and bottom thereof; the same Nature having consumed all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these, and these, be the causes of these and these effects, Time hath taught us; and not Reason; and so hath Experience without Art. The Chief-wisdom knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that sowre Rennet doth coagulate her Milk into a Curd. But, if we ask a reason of this cause, why the sowreness doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I think that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philosophy, to satisfie this, and many other like vulgar questions. But man, to cover his ignorance in the least things, who cannot give a true reason for the Grass under his feet, why it should be green rather than red, or of any other colour; that could never yet discover the way and reason of Nature's working, in those which are far less noble Creatures than himself; who is far more noble than the Heavens themselves: Man (saith Solomon) that can hardly discern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour find out the things that are before us; that hath so short a time in the World, as he no sooner begins to learn, than to die; that hath so short but borrowed knowledge; in his understanding nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Essence of his own Soul, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be he) could never so much as define, but by the Action and Effect, telling us what it works (which all men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any else doth know, but GOD that created it (For though I were perfect, yet I know not my Soul, saith Job.) Man, I say, that is but an Idiot in the next cause of his own life, and in the cause of all actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (saith Job) is so excellent as we know him not; and examine the beginning of the work, which had end before Mankind had a beginning of being. He will disable God's power to make a World, without matter to make it of. He will rather give the Motes of the Air for a cause; cast the work on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of Form; and lastly, for want of a work-man, have it Eternal; which latter Opinion Aristotle, to make himself the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World; and his Sectators have maintained it; Parati ac conjurati, quos sequuntur Philosophorum animis invidis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who lived at once with, or soon after Moses, Moses, Zoroaster, Musæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melissus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whose Opinions are exquisitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the necessity of invincible reason, One Eternal and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the Universal. Horum omnium sententia quamvis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, ut providentiam unam esse consentiant: five enim Natura, five Æther, five Ratio, five Mens, five Fatalis Necessitas, five divina Lex, idem est quod a nobis dicitur Deus; All these mens Opinions (saith Lactantius) though uncertain, come to this; That they agree upon one Providence, whether the same be Nature, or Light, or Reason, or Understanding, or Destiny, or divine Ordinance, that it is the same which we call G O D. Certainly, as all the Rivers in the World, though they have divers risings, and divers runnings; though they sometimes hide themselves for a while under ground, and seem to be lost in Sea-like Lakes; do at last find, and fall into, the great Ocean: so after all the searches that humane capacity hath; and after all Philosophical contemplation and curiosity, in the necessity of this Infinite power, all the reason of Man ends and dissolves it self.

As for others: and first touching those which conceive the matter of the World to have been eternal; and, that God did not create the World, ex nihilo, but ex materia præexistente; the Supposition is so weak, as is hardly worth the answering. For (saith Eusebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annexere; They seem unto me, which affirm this, to give part of the work to God, and part to Fortune; in so much as if God had not found this first matter by chance, He had never been Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Universal. For, were the Matter or Chaos eternal, it then follows, That either this supposed Matter did fit it self to God, or God accommodate himself to the matter. For the first; it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselves to the Work-mans Will. For the second; it were horrible to conceive of God, That as an Artificer he applied himself, according to the proportion of matter which he lighted upon.

But let it be supposed, That this matter hath been made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wise; I would gladly learn how it came to pass, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent, and infinitely wise; and no more, nor no less, than served to receive the form of the Universal. For, had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient; then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as served to finish the work of the World: Or, had there been more of this matter than sufficed, then God did dissolve and annihilate whatsoever remained and was superfluous. And this must every reasonable Soul confess, That it is the same work of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing, And by the same Art and Power, and by none other, can those things, or any part of that eternal matter, be again changed into Nothing; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to say that this matter was the cause of it self; this, of all other, were the greatestst Idiotism. For, if it were the cause of it self at any time; then there was also a time when it self was not; at which time of not being, it is easie enough to conceive, that it could neither procure it self, nor any thing else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible.

impossible. Nihil autem seipsum præcedit, neque seipsum componit corpus; There is nothing that doth precede it self, neither do bodies compound themselves.

For the rest, Those that feign this matter to be eternal, must of necessity confess, that Infinite cannot be separate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite form; but that the first matter was finite, the form which it received proves it. For conclusion of this part, whosoever will make choice, rather to believe in eternal deformity, or in eternal dead matter, than in eternal light, and eternal life; let eternal death be his reward. For, it is a madness of that kind, as wanteth terms to express it. For what reason of man (whom the curse of presumption hath not stupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of shadow; quia comprehensio est intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it self, either for matter or form; yea, for as many worlds (if such had been Gods will) as the Sea hath sands? For where the power is without limitation, the work hath no other limitation than the work-mans will. Yea, Reason it self finds it more easie for Infinite power, to deliver from it self a finite world, without the help of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a fool and dust, to change the form of matter made to his hands. They are Dionisius his words; Deus in una existentia omnia præhabet; and again, Esse omnium est ipsa Divinitas, omne quod vides, & quod non vides; to wit, causalliter, or in better terms, non tanquam forma, sed tanquam causa universalis. Neither hath the World Universal closed up all of G O D: For the most part of his works (saith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his Wisdom be opened by the glorious work of the World; which never brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes, That we seldom entitle G O D The All-throwing, or The All-willing; but the Almighty, that is, infinitely able.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing, nothing is made, infer the Worlds eternity; and yet not so salvage therein, as those are, which give an eternal being to dead matter: It is true, if the word [Nothing] be taken in the affirmative; and the making, imposed upon Natural Agents and finite power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctor, Aristotle himself confesseth, Quod omnes Antiqui decreverunt quasi quoddam rerum principium, ipsumque infinitum; That all the Antient decree a kind of beginning, and the same to be infinite; and a little after, more largely, and plainly, Principium ejus est nullum, sed ipsum omnium denunciat esse principium, ac omni completi ac regere: it is strange, that this Philosopher, with his followers, should rather make choice out of falsehood, to conclude falsly; than out of truth, to resolve truly. For, if we compare the World Universal, and all the unmeasurable Orbs of Heaven, and those marvellous bodies of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, with ipsum Infinitum, it may truly be said of them all, which himself affirms of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in Gods power. And therefore, Anaximander, Melissus, and Empedocles, call the World Universal, but, particulam Universitatis & infinitatis; a parcel of that which is the Universality, and the Infinity it self; And Plato, but a shadow of God. But the other, to prove the World's eternity, urgeth this Maxime, That, A sufficient and effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted. Inferring, that God being for ever a sufficient and effectual cause of the World, the effect of the cause should also have been for ever; to wit, the World universal. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a Master, to confess a sufficient and effectual cause of the World (to wit, an Almighty God) in his Antecedent; and the same God to be a God restrained in his Conclusion; to make God free in power, and bound in will; able to effect, unable to determine; able to make all things, and yet unable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiously to resolve of God, as of natural necessity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor understanding; which cannot but work, matter being present: As Fire, to burn things combustible. Again, he thus disputeth, That every Agent which can work, and doth not work, if it afterward work, it is either thereto moved by it self, or by somewhat else; and so it passeth from power to act: But God (saith he) is immovable, and is neither moved by himself, nor by any other; but being always the same, doth always work. Whence he concludeth, If the World were caused by God, that he was for ever the cause thereof; and therefore eternal. The answer to this is very easie; For that God's performing in due time that, which he ever determined at length to perform, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him. For the same action of his will, which made the World for ever, did also withhold the effect to the time ordained. To this answer, in it self sufficient, others add further, that the Pattern or Image of the World may be said to be eternal; which the Platonicks call Spirituale mundi; and do in this sort distinguish the Idea and Creation in time. Spiritus est mundus, mundi huius exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æquali est Architecto, fuit semper cum illo, ætæque semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, decedit jam ab opifice ex parte una, quia non fuit semper; retinet alteram, quia sit semper futurus: That representative, or the intentional word (say they) the samplar of this visible world, the first work of GOD, was equally ancient with the Architect; for it was for ever with him, and ever shall be. This material world, the second work or creature of GOD, doth differ from the Worker in this; that it was not from everlasting, and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for ever to come; The first point, That it was not for ever, all Christians confess: The other they understand no otherwise, than that after the consummation of this world, there shall be a new Heaven, and a new Earth, without any new creation of matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue; though such opinions be not unworthy the propounding, in this consideration, of an eternal and unchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporal effect; Touching which point, Proclus the Platonist disputeth, That the compounded Essence of the World (and because compounded, therefore dissolvable) is continued, and knit to the Divine Being, by an individual and inseparable power, flowing from Divine unity; and that the World's natural appetite of God sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a good and understanding divine; and that this virtue, by which the World is continued and knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and everlastingly continue and preserve the same. Which infinite Virtue, the finite World (saith he) is not capable of, but receiveth it from the divine infinite, according to the temporal Nature it hath, successively every moment by little and little; even as the whole material World is not altogether; but the abolished parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the same small degrees succeed, as the shadow of a tree in a River, seemeth to have continued the same a long time in the Water, but it is perpetually renewed in the continual ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to return to them, which denying that ever the World had any beginning, will deny that ever it shall have any end, and to this purpose affirm, That it was never heard, never read, never seen, no, not by any reason perceived, that the Heavens have ever suffered corruption; or that they appear any way the older by continuance; or in any sort otherwise than they were; which had they been subject to final corruption, some change would have been discerned in so long a time. To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather prove their newness, and that they have not continued so long, than that they will continue for ever as they are. And if conjectural arguments may receive answer by conjectures; it then seemeth, that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Pliny, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossly mistaken; or else those parts of the World, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Sun's heat, neither were the Seas under the Equinoctial navigable. But we know by experience, that those Regions so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, over which we navigate, passable enough. We read also many Histories of Deluges; and how that in the time of Phæton, divers places in the World were burnt up, by the Sun's violent heat.

But in a word, this Observation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certain, That Stone-walls, of matter mouldring and friable, have stood two or three thousand years; that many things have been digged up out of the Earth, of that depth, as supposed to have been buried by the general Flood; without any alteration, either of substance or figure; yea, it is believed, and it is very probable, that the Gold which is daily found in Mines and Rocks, under ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times have not invaded and corrupted; what great alterations should we look for in Celestial and Quintessential bodies? And yet we have reason to think, that the Sun, by whose help all creatures are generate, doth not in these later Ages assist Nature, as heretofore. We have neither Giants, such as the eldest World had, nor Mighty Men, such as the elder World had; but all things in general are reputed of less virtue which from the Heavens receive virtue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger Discourse, we might easily fetch store of proof; as that this World shall at length have end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good Answer that can be to this Objection: If the World were eternal; why not all things in the World eternal? If there were no first, no Cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible Wisdom, but that every Nature had been alike eternal; and Man more rational than every other Nature; Why had not the eternal reason of Man, provided for his eternal Being in the World? For, if all were equal, why not equal conditions to all? Why should Heavenly bodies live for ever, and the bodies of Men rot and die?

Again, who was it that appointed the Earth to keep the Centre, and gave order that it should should hang in the Air ; that the Sun should travel between the Tropicks, and never exceed those bounds, nor fail to perform that Progress once in every year ; the Moon to live by borrowed light ; the fixed Starrs (according to common opinion) to be fastned like nails in a Cart-wheel ; and the Planets to wander at their pleasure ? Or, if none of these had power over other ; was it out of Charity and Love, that the Sun by his perpetual travel within those two Circles, hath visited, given light unto, and relieved all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turns and times ? Out of doubt, if the Sun have of his own accord kept this course in all eternity ; He may justly be called eternal Charity, and everlasting Love. The same may be said of all the Starrs, who being all of them most large and clear fountains of vertue and operation, may also be called eternal Vertues ; the Earth may be called eternal Patience ; the Moon, an eternal Borrower, and Beggar ; and Man, of all other the most miserable, eternally Mortal. And what were this, but to believe again in the old Play of the gods ? Tea, in more gods by Millions, than ever Hesiodus dream'd of. But in stead of this mad folly, we see it well enough with our feeble and mortal eyes : and the eyes of our reason discern it better ; That the Sun, Moon, Starrs, and the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained ; themselves they have not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinaverit ; Every thing hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now, for Nature ; As by the ambiguity of this name, the School of Aristotle hath both commended many errors unto us, and sought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the governing of the World ; so if the best definition be taken out of the second of Aristotle's Physicks, or primo de Coelo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphysicks, I say, that the best is but nominal, and serving only to difference the beginning of Natural motion from Artificial : which yet the Academics open better ; when they call it, A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soul of the World ; who give the first place to Providence, the second to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Providentia (by which they understand G O D) Dux & Caput ; Fatum, medium ex providentia prodiens ; Natura postremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of these (God excepted) or participating of all ; yet that it hath choice or understanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath avowed. For this is unanswerable of Lactantius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem facienti habet, aut scientiam ; He only can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the will and science of Nature, are in these words truly express'd by Ficinus : Potest ubique Natura, vel per diversâ media, vel ex diversis materiis, diversâ facere ; sublatâ vero mediâ materiarumque diversitate, vel unicum, vel similitudinem operatur, neque potest quando adest materia non operari ; It is the power of Nature by diversity of means, or out of diversity of matter, to produce divers things : but taking away the diversity of means, and the diversity of matter, it then works but one or the like work ; neither can it but work, matter being present. Now, if Nature made choice of diversity of matter, to work all these variable works of Heaven and Earth, it had then both understanding and will ; it had counsel to begin ; reason to dispose dispose ; vertue and knowledge to finish, and power to govern ; without which, all things had been but one and the same ; all of the matter of Heaven ; or all of the matter of Earth. And, if we grant Nature this will, and this understanding, this counsel, this reason, and power ; Cur natura potius quam Deus nominetur ? Why should we then call such a cause rather Nature, than God ? God, of whom all men have notion, and give the first and highest place to divine power : Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omnesque summum locum divino cuidam numini assignant. And this I say, in short, that it is a true effect of true reason in man (were there no authority more binding than reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power. Vera Philosophia, est ascensus ab his quæ fiunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere sunt, & semper eadem : True Philosophy is an ascending from the things which flow, and rise, and fall, to the things that are for ever the same.

For the rest ; I do also account it not the meanest, but an impiety, monstrous, to confound God and Nature ; be it but in terms. For it is God, that only disposeth of all things according to his own will, and maketh of one Earth, vessels of honour and dishonour : It is Nature that can dispose of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God that commandeth all ; it is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God that doth good unto all, knowing and loving the good he doth. It is Nature that secondarily doth also good, but it neither knoweth, nor loveth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himself ; Nature nothing in it self. It is God which is the Father, and hath begotten all things ; it is Nature which is begotten by all things, in which it liveth and laboureth ; for by it self it existeth not. For, shall we say, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heavy things fall towards it ? Shall we call it Reason, which doth conduct every River into the salt Sea ? Shall we term it knowledge in Fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter ? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in these ; by the same Affection, Reason, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh. And therefore, seeing all things work as they do (call it by Form, or Nature, or by what you please) yet, because they work by an impulsion, which they cannot resist ; or by a faculty, infused by the supremest power ; we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the wonder ; and to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things, and such a faculty, as neither knowing it self, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath ; doth yet work all things to their last and uttermost perfection. And therefore every reasonable man, taking to himself for a ground that which is granted by all Amiquity, and by all men truly learned that ever the World had, to wit ; That there is a power Infinite, and eternal (which also necessity doth prove unto us, without the help of Faith and Reason ; without the force of Authority) all things do as easily follow which have been delivered by divine Letters, as the waters of a running River do successively pursue each other from the first fountains.

Thus much, I say, it is, that Reason it self hath taught us ; and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio sequitur ; quia prius est Deum scire, consequens colere ; Sapientia goes before, Religion follows ; because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapientia, Plato calleth absoluti boni scientiam, The Science of the the absolute good: And another, Scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (faith Iſidore) is not extorted by violence; but by reason and examples persuaded: Fides nequaquam vi extorquetur, sed ratione & exemplis fundetur. I confeſs it, That to enquire further, as of the Essence of God, of his Power, of his Art, and by what mean be created the World; Or of his secret judgment, and the causes, is not an affect of Reason; Sed cum ratione insaniunt; but they grow mad with reason, that enquire after it: For, as it is no shame nor dishonour (saith a French Author) de faire arrest au but qu'on n'asceu surpasser; For a man to rest himself there, where he finds it impossible to pass on further: so whatsoever is beyond, and out of the reach of true reason, it acknowledgeth it to be so; as understanding it self not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that best knows the end of his own Art. For, seeing both Reason and Necessity teach us (Reason, which is pars divini spiritus in corpus humanum merſi) that the World was made by a Power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach us: and seeing the same Reason and Necessity make us know, that the same infinite Power is every where in the World; and yet how every where it cannot inform us: our belief hereof is not weakened, but greatly strengthened by our ignorance, because it is the same Reason that tells us, That such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conceived by Man.

Quid est infinitum, et non finitum? cum de non finitum terminum, cumque continetur a finitum. et est. post.

I have been already over-long, to make any large Discourse, either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine own excuse; especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the grossest, the unsuitable division of the Books, I could not know how to excuse, had I not been directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first Part finished. All men know, that there is no great Art in the dividing evenly of those things, which are subject to number and measure. For the rest, it suits well enough with a great many Books of this Age, which speak too much, and yet say little, ipsi nobis furto subducimur; We are stolen away from our selves, setting a high price on all that is our own. But hereof, though a late good Writer, make complaint, yet shall it not lay bold on me, because I believe as he doth; That who so thinks himself the wisest man, is but a poor and miserable Ignorant. Those that are the best men of Warr, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do always keep the strongest guards against themselves, to defend them from their selves; from self-love, self-estimation, and self-opinion.

Generally, concerning the order of the Work, I have only taken counsel from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the down-fall of Babel take up the first Part, and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of Posterity; some few enterprises, greater in Fame than Faith, of Ninus and Semiramis, excepted.

It was the Story of the Hebrews, of all before Olympiads; that overcame the consuming disease of Time, and preserved it self from the very Cradle and Beginning to this day; and yet not so entire, but that the large Discourses thereof (to which, in many Scriptures, we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the Actions of those Kings and Princes which shot up here and there in the same Time, I am driven to relate by way of digression; of which we may say with Virgil:

Apparent

The Preface.

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto;
They appear here and there, floating in the great gulf of Time.

To the same first Ages do belong the report of many Inventions therein found, and from them derived to us; though most of the Authors Names have perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Laws; they had their diversity of Government; they had Kingly rule; Nobility; Policy in Warr; Navigation, and all, or the most of needful Trades. To speak therefore of these (seeing in a general History we should have left a great deal of Nakedness by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is, that I have also made many others; which, if they shall be laid to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heap of humane error. For, seeing we digress in the ways of our lives; yea, seeing the life of Man is nothing else but digression; I may the better be excused, in writing their lives and actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Laws of History, and of the kinds.

The same hath been taught by many, but by no man better, and with greater brevity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman, Sir Francis Bacon. Christian Laws are also taught us by the Prophets and Apostles; and every day preach'd unto us. But we still make large digressions; yea, the Teachers themselves do not (in all) keep the path which they point out to others.

For the rest, after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldeans, and had raised a great Monarchy, producing actions of more importance than were elsewhere to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire; whilst it so flourished, that the affairs of the Nations adjoining had reference thereto. The like observance was to be used towards the Fortunes of Greece, when they again began to get ground upon the Persians; as also towards the affairs of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty than the Greeks.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations, who resisted the beginnings of the former Empire, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement: it seemed best to remember what was known of them from their several beginnings, in such times and places as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies, which in the end swallowed them up. And herein I have followed the best Geographers; who seldom give names to those small Brooks, whereof many joined together make great Rivers; till such time as they become united, and run in main stream to the Ocean Sea. If the Phrase be weak, and the Style not every where like it self; the first shows their legitimation and true Parent; the second will excuse it self upon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili avena, used stronger pipes, when he sounded the wars of Æneas. It may also be laid to my charge, that I use divers Hebrew words in my first Book, and elsewhere in which language others may think, and my self acknowledg it, that I am altogether ignorant; but it is true, that some of them I find in Montanus, others in Latine Characters in S. Senensis; and of the rest I have borrowed the interpretation of some of my friends. But say, I had been beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondered at, having had an eleven years leisure to attain the knowledge of that, or of any other Tongue;

How-

The Preface.

Howsoever, I know that it will be said by many, That I might have been more pleasing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine own Times, having been permitted to draw water as near the Well-head as another. To this I answer, That whosoever in writing a modern History, shall follow Truth too near the heels, it may haply strike out his teeth. There is no Mistress or Guide that hath led her followers and servants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himself; and he that walks after her at a middle distance; I know not whether I should call that kind of course, Temper, or Baseness. It is true, that I never travelled after mens Opinions, when I might have made the best use of them; and I have now too few days remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extreme ambition, or extreme cowardise, or both, do yet (when Death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the World, between the Bed and the Grave. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest Times; wherein also, why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and tax the Vices of those that are yet living, in their persons that are long since dead; and have it laid to my charge? But this I cannot help, though innocent. And certainly, if there be any, that finding themselves spotted like the Tigers of old time, shall find fault with me for painting them over anew, they shall therein accuse themselves justly, and me falsely.

For, I protest before the Majesty of God, that I malice no man under the Sun. Impossible I know it is, to please all; seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subjection to their private passions, but that they seem drivers persons in one and the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I: Unus mihi pro populo erat: and to the same effect, Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis, sed tibi; (or as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an antient Philosopher, Satis est unus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the service of that inestimable Prince, Henry, the successive hope; and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I undertook this Work. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amiss. It is now left to the World without a Master; from which, all that is presented, hath received both blows and thanks: Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus est omnis iudicii, in quo lis secundum plures datur. But these Discourses are idle. I know, that as the charitable will judge charitably; so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present adversity hath disarmed me. I am on the ground already; and therefore have not farr to fall; and for rising again, as in the Natural privation, there is no recession to habit; so it is seldom seen in the privation poltick. I do therefore forbear to stile my Readers, Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good Opinions; or to promise a second and third Volume (which I also intend) if the first receive grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certain, let us claw the Reader with never to many courteous Rbrafes, yet shall we evermore be thought fools, that write foolishly. For conclusion, all the hope I have, lies in this, That I have already found more ungentle and uncourteous Readers of my Love towards them, and well-deserving of them, than ever I shall do again. For had it been otherwise; I should hardly have had this leisure to have made my self a Fool in Print.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preservation of the World.

S. I.

That the Invisible God is seen in his Creatures.

OD, whom the wisest men acknowledg to be a Power uneffable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant clarity invisible; an Understanding which it self can only comprehend; an Essence eternal and spiritual, of absolute pureness and simplicity; was, and is pleased to make himself known by the Work of the World: in the wonderful magnitude whereof (all which he imbraceth, filleth, and sustaineth) we behold the Image of that glory which cannot be measured, and withall, that one, and yet universal Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heaven, we perceive a shadow of his divine Countenance; in his merciful provision for all that live, his manifold goodness: and lastly, in creating and making existent the World universal, by the absolute Art of his own Word, his Power and Almightyness; which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisdom, and Goodness, being all but Attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and variety of Celestial and Terrestrial bodies: Terrestrial, in their strange and manifold diversities; Celestial, in their beauty and magnitude; which in their continual and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approach to the knowledge of the omnipotent cause, and by these motions, their Almighty Maker.

In these more then wonderful works, God (saith * Hugo) speaketh unto man: and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, those that live, witness in themselves;

selfes; the sensible in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable souls: for, according to *S. Gregory, Omnis homo eo ipso quod rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ratione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet; Every man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Job) which is, according to the Fathers, Dominationem illius conspiciere in creaturis, & discerni eum in his providentia per creaturas; That God hath been otherwise seen, to wit, with corporal eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my understanding, grounded on these places of S. John and S. Paul, Te have not heard his voice at any time, neither have ye seen his shape. And again, Whom never man saw, nor can see.

And this I am sure agrees with the nature of Gods simplicity, of which S. Augustine, Ipsa enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, id ipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videri non potest; That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatsoever that be, the same cannot be corporally perceived. And of this opinion were Origen, Cyril, Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzen, Hierom, Augustine, Gregory the great, Evaristus, Alcuinus, Dionysius, Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authority. But by his own Word, and by this visible World, is God perceived of men; which is also the understood language of the Almighty, vouchsafed to all his Creatures, whose Hieroglyphical Characters are the unnumbered Stars, the Sun and Moon; written on these large Volumes of the Firmament: written also on the Earth and the Seas, and by the Letters of all those living creatures, and plants, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned Cyprianus, Mundus universus nihil aliud est, quam Deus explicatus; The World universal is nothing else but God exprest. And the invisible things of God (saith S. Paul) are seen by the creation of the World, being considered in his creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding then his own Will, no other matter then his own Power, no other Workman then his own Word, no other consideration then his own infinite goodness. The example and pattern of these his Creatures, as he beheld the same in all eternity in the abundance of his own love, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his unchangeable Will moved, by his high Wisdom disposed, and by his Almighty Power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to love God, ex fide, & ex effectibus (that is) both persuaded by his Word, and by the effects of the Worlds Creation: Neque enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognoscique potest, sed vel ex rerum, que facte sunt, quaeque sunt & gubernantur, observatione & collatione; vel ex ipsius Dei verbo: For he of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be known by any knowledge of cause or beginning (saith Montanus) but either by the observing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and govern; or else by the word of God himself.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the World to have been created by God.

This work and creation of the World, did most of the antient and learned Philosophers acknowledg, though by divers terms, and in a different manner exprest; I mean all those who are intitled by S. Augustine, Summi Philosophi, Philosophers of highest judgment and understanding. Mercerius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium universi. The original of the Universal; to whom he giveth also the attributes of Mens, Natura, Agens, Necessitas, Finis, & Renovatio. And wherein he truly with S. Paul, casteth upon God all power; confessing also, that the World was made by Gods Almighty Word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heraclitus followed in opinion) took the word Fire to exprest God by (as in Deuteronomy, and in S. Paul it is used) Omnia ex uno igne genita sunt, All things (saith he) are caused or produced out of one fire.

So did Orpheus plainly teach, that the World had beginning in time, from the Will of the most high God; whose remarkable words are thus converted; Cum abscondisset omnia Jupiter summus, deinde in lunem gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceive this sense; When great Jupiter had bidden all things in himself, working out of the love of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth, into grateful light, the admirable works which he had fore-thought.

Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most High, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Unus Deus, Pater, Creator summus. Plato calleth God the cause and original, the nature and reason of the universal; Totius rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

Now, although the curiosity of some men have found it superfluous, to remember the opinions

Of the meaning of the words Heaven and Earth, Genes. 2. 1.

The Universal matter of the world (which Ados comprehendeth under the names of Heaven and Earth) is by divers diversly understood; for there are that conceive, that by those words was meant the first matter, as the Peripateticks understand it; to which S. Augustine and Isidore seem to adhere, Fecisti mundum (saith S. Augustine) de materia informi; quam fecisti de nullare, pene nullam rem; that is, Thou hast made the world of a matter without form; which matter thou madest of nothing, and being made, it was little other then nothing.

But this potential and imaginary materia prima, cannot exist without form. Peter Lombard, the schoolmen, Beda, Tyranus, Comestor, Tostatus, and others affirm that it pleased God first of all to create the Emphyrean Heaven: which at the succeeding instant (saith Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Emphyrean Heaven Stenobius Euphrynus calleth Divine clarity and uncreated; an error, for which he is sharply charged by Pererius, though (as I conceive) he rather failed in the subsequent, when he made it to be a place, and the seat of Angels and just Souls, then in the former affirmation; for of the first, That God liveth in eternal Light, it is written, My soul, praise thou the Lord, that covereth himself with light; and in the Revelation, And the City hath no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein also John Mercer upon Genes. 1. differeth not in opinion from Euphrynus; for as by Heaven created in the beginning, was not meant the invisible or super-celestial; so in his judgment, because it was in all eternity the glorious seat of God himself; it was not necessary to be created; Quem Mundum super-celstem meo iudicio creavi (saith Mercer) non erat necesse.

But as Ados forbore to speak of Angels, and of things invisible and incorporate, for the weakness of their capacities, whom he then cared to inform of those things which were most manifest, (to wit) that God did not only by a strong hand deliver them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promise made to their forefathers; but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this aspectable, and perceivable Universal: so on the other side I dare not think, that any super-celestial Heaven, or whatsoever else (not himself) was increate and eternal; and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wisdom of mortal men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the feat of infinite power, no more then infinite power it self can be limited: for his place is in Himself, whom no magnitude else can contain: How great is the boue of God (saith Baruch) how large is the place of his possession; it is great, and hath no end, it is high and unmeasurable.

But leaving multiplicity of opinion, it is more probable and allowed, that by the words Heaven and Earth, was meant the solid matter and substance, as well of all the Heavens, and Orbs supernal, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which covered it over, (to wit) that very matter of all things, Materia, Chaos, possibilitas, five posse fieri. Which matter (saith Calvin) was so called, quod totius mundi (men fuerit); Because it was the seed of the Universal: an opinion of ancient Philosophers long before.

§. V.

That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by Moses understood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of unformed and void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heavens.

Moses first nameth Heaven and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth; but afterwards he nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to distinguish the confused Mals, and (as Basil saith) Preparare naturam aque ad secretitatem vitalis; To prepare the nature of water to a vital fruitfulness.

Eys. 51.

Gen. 1. 9.

Pf. 104. 6.

For under the word Heaven, was the matter of all heavenly bodies, and natures expressit: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatsoever is under the Moon, and subject to alteration. Corrupt seeds bring forth corrupt plants to which the pure heavens are not subject, though subject to perishing. They shall perish (saith David) and the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, saith Esay. Neither were the waters the matter of Earth; for it is written, Let the waters under the heavens be gathered into one place, and let the dry land appear: which proveth, that the dry land was mixt and covered with the waters and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the waters were the matter or seed of the Earth, much less of the Universal. Initio tu, Domine, terram fundasti, Thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the Earth: and again, The Earth was covered with the Deep (meaning with waters) as with a garment, saith

David. And if by natural arguments it may be proved, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth us also, that earth rarified may become water: water, air; air, fire: and so on the contrary. Dens ignis substantiam per aerem in aquam convertit, God turneth the substance of fire by air into water. For the Heavens and the Earth remained in the same state, in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicity of perfection, in respect of beauty and ornament. Celum verò & terra in statu creati- onis remanserunt quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita esset. And the word which the Hebrews call Maím, is not to be understood according to the Latine translation simply, and as specific water; but the same more properly signifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Est autem Maím liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero Aquas fecit; For Maím (saith he) is a double liquor (that is, of divers natures) and this name or word the Latines, wanting a voice to express it, call it in the Plural, Aquas, Waters.

This Maím, or indigested matter, or Chaos, created in the beginning, was without form, that is, without the proper form, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the Waters. And the Earth was void, that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and wrought this indigested matter into that form, which it now retaineth; then did the earth bud forth the herb, which seedeth seed, and the fruitful tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good; which attribute was not given to the Earth, while it was confused; nor to the Heavens, before they had motion, and adornment. God saw that it was good, that is, made perfect: for perfection is that to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecti sunt opera; The works of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the ancient Poets their invention of Demogogon; Hesiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that Chaos: of which Ovid; Ante Mare, & Terras, & (quod tegit omnia)

Caelum,

Unus erat toto nature vultus in Orbe, Quem dixere Chaos, rudis indigestaque moles.

Before the Sea and Land was made, and Heaven, that all doth hide,

In all the World one onely face of Nature did abide:

Which Chaos high, a huge rude heap.

After the Creation of Heaven and Earth, then void and without form, the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters. The Seventy Interpreters use the word superferebat (saith Hierome) out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meantur, sed viri cuiusdam Syri sententiam recense- bo (saith Basil;) which words incubare or fovere, importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, have a special likeness. Verbum translatum est ab ovibus pullitici sue incubantibus, quavis spiritali, & plane inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their young, not corporally, but in a spiritual and unexpressible manner.

Some of the Hebrews convert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volitabat. The Spirit of God did flutter: the Chaldean Paraphrast in this sense, Ventus a conspectu Dei sustabat; or, as other understand the Chaldean, Flabat, pellebat, removebat: The wind from the face of God did blow under, drive, or remove, or did blow upon; according to the 147. Psalm, He caused his wind to blow, and the waters increased; but there was yet no wind nor exhalation. Arias Montanus in these words, Et Spiritus Elobim Merachest, id est, efficaciter movit liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often moving, keeping warm, and cherishing, quickning and stirring upon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh four originals, whereof three are agents, and the last passive and material, to wit, Causa, which is the divine Goodness: Subiectum, which is, fiat, five erit, Let it be, or, It shall be. Que vox verbo dei prima prolata fuit: Which voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the Word of God. The third, Spiritus Elobim, the Spirit of God, id est, Vis quaedam divina, agilis ac presens, per omnia pertransiens, omnia complectens; that is, A certain divine power, or strength every where active and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Maím, id est, Materies ad emnem rem conficiendam habilis; Matter apt to become every thing. For my self, I am relieved (Cum Deus sit super rationalem omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reason above reason) that although the effects which follow his wonderful waies of working, may in a measure be perceived by mans understanding, yet the manner and first operation of his divine power, cannot be conceived by any mind, or spirit, compassed with a mortal body. Animalis homo que Dei sunt non percipit: For my thoughts (saith the Lord in Esay) are not your thoughts, neither are your waies my waies. And as the world hath not known God himself: so are his waies (according to S. Paul) past finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not known thee, saith Christ. And therefore, whether that motion, vitality, and operation, were by incubation or how else, the manner is onely known to God. Quomodo in omnibus sit rebus vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intentum nos non capit; For how God (saith S. Augustine, speaking of his Ubiquity) is in all things, either by essence, presence, or power, our understanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominemque distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius Majestatis eterne, cogitatio assequeretur humana: There would be no difference between God and man, if man's understanding could conceive the counsels and disposing of that eternal Majesty; and therefore to be over-curious in searching how the all-powerful Word of God wrought in the Creation of the World, or his all-piercing and operative spirit distinguishing, gave form to the Matter of the Universal, is a labour and search like unto his, who not contented with a known and safe Foord, will presume to pass over the greatest River in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his understanding. We behold the Sun, and enjoy his light, as long as we look towards it, but tenderly and circumpectly: we warm our selves safely, while we stand near the fire, but if we seek to our face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to eschew curiosity: this is true, that the English word (moved) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoever is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with Miracula, Vis cause efficientis, The force of the efficient cause; S. Augustine sometimes taketh for the Holy Ghost; Sometimes for a wind or breath, Sub nomine spiritus, under the name of a spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it also a breath or wind: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritus teneum intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: Anaxagoras, Mentem; Tostatus, oluntatem & mentem Dei, The will and mind of God; which Maím, Plato in Timæo maketh Animam mundi, The soul of the world world: and in his sixth Book de Republica, he calleth it the Law of Heaven; in his Epistles, The Leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the incarnation of Christ our Saviour, Mens defecit, vox flet, & non mea tantum, sed etiam Angelorum; My mind faileth, my voice is silent, and not mine only, but even the voice of Angels: so may all men else say in the understanding and utterance of the waies and works of the Creation; for to him (saith Nazianzenus) there is not one substance by which he is, and another, by which he can, sed consubstantialis illi est, quicquid ejus est, & quicquid est; Whatsoever attribute of him there is, and whatsoever he is, it is the very same substance that himself is.

But the Spirit of God which moved upon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite active power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustaineth and giveth continuance to the Universal. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the same is it which maintaineth all things, saith Solomon. Ishou send forth thy spirit (saith David) they are created: And Gregory, Deus suo presentialis esse, dat omnibus rebz esse, ita quod si se rebz subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihilum deferrentur universa; God goeth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himself from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would again fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath exprest excellently:

Principio Caelum ac Terras, camposque liquentes, Lucentemq; globum Lunæ, Titaniaq; æthere, Spiritus intus alit: totamq; insula per artus, Mens agit molem, & magno se corpore miscet.

The Heaven, and Earth, and all the liquid Mayn,

The Moon's bright Globe, and Stars Titanian

A Spirit within maintains: and their whole mass,

A mind, which through each part infused doth pass,

Fashions, and works, and wholly doth transpire

All this great Body of the Universe.

And this was the same Spirit, which moved in the Universal, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. His Spirit hath garnished the Heavens, saith Job. So then the Spirit of God moved upon the waters, and created in them their spirituality, and natural motion; motion brought forth heat; and heat rarification, and subtilty of parts. By this Spirit (which gave heat and motion, and thereby, operation to every nature, while it moved upon the waters, which were in one indigested lump, and Chaos, disposed to all forms alike) was begotten Aire: an element superiour, as lighter then the waters; through whose vast, open, subtle, Diaphanick, or transparent body, the light, afterwards created, might easily transpire: Light for the excellency thereof being the first creature which God called good, whose creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chrysostom calleth a vital Operation, Aquis à Deo instans, ex qua aqua non solum motionem, sed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A vital Operation given by God unto the waters, whereby the waters had not only motion, but also power to procreate or bring forth living Creatures.

Of the Light created, as the material substance of the Sun, and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and use of it: and of motion, and heat annexed unto it.

THESE Waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and united, and called the Sun, the Organ and Instrument of created light. For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceive) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the Suns creation, and the uniting of the dispersed light therein. This is proved by these words, Let there be light in the Firmament, to separate the day from the night: which lights in the Firmament of Heaven, were also made for signes, and for seasons, and for daies, and for years, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which, days and years are distinguished; after which succeeded Time, or together with which, that Time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three days which preceded the Suns creation, or formal perfection; when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the Day named in the fifth Verle; was but such a space, as afterwards by the Suns motion made a civil or natural day. And as Waters were the matter of Aire, of the firmament, and of the lower and upper waters, and of the Seas, and Creatures therein; Earth, the matter of Beasts, Plants, Minerals, and Mans body: so may Light (for expression sake) be called the Chaos, or material substance of the

the Sun, and other lights of heaven: Howbeit, neither the Sun, nor any thing sensible, is that light itself, Quæ causa est lucidorum, which is the cause that things are lightsome (though it make it self and all things else visible) but a body most illighted, which illuminateth the Moon, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Æther, the place of the supposed Element of fire) is effected and qualified, and by it all bodies living in this our ayre. For this light Avicenna calleth Vehiculum & fomentum omnium celestium virtutum, & impressionum: The conductor, and preserver, or nourisher of all celestial virtues and impressions, nothing descending of heavenly influences, but by the medium, or means of light. Aristotle calleth light a quality, inherent or cleaving to a Diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inherens Diaphano: but this may be better avouched of the heat, which it transporteth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heat (say the Platonicks) Aveniente lumine residet in subiecto, The light being departed, doth reside in the subject, as warmth in the ayre, though the same be deprived of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academicks make incorporeal, and so doth Montanus, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium; Which neither hardness resisteth, nor space leaveth.

Lucid. lib. I. cap. 11.

Aristotle findeth corporality in the beams of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, saith Picolominens. Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, give materiality to light itself, but improperly: for it passeth at an instant from the Heaven to the Earth, nor is it resisted by any hardness, because it passeth through the solid body of glass, or other Crystalline matters; and whereas it is withstood by unclean and unpure earthy substances, less hard, and more calie to invade then the former, the same is, Quod obstatulum naturæ terrenæ æquæ, sordidum, non capit candidam luminis puritatem; Because an obstacle by nature earthy and foul, doth not receive the pure clearness of light: alluding to that most divine Light, which onely shineth on those minds, which are purged from all worldly dross, and humane uncleannesse.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion; neither do I marvel at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or School-men, or other ancient or latter Writers, that any of them understood either it or themselves therein: all men (to cast off ignorance) have disputed thereof, but there is no man that hath been taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferior to any in wit) as he hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Bedæ, Iungo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others: so is his own judgment herein, as weak as any mans; and most of the School-men were rather curious in the nature of terms, and more subtle in distinguishing upon the parts of doctrine already laid down, then discoverers of any thing hidden, either in Philosophy or Divinity: of whom it may be truly said, Nihil sapientie odiosius acutissime nimio; Nothing is more odious to true wisdom, than too acute sharpness. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men, (which the same time hath brought forth and devoured) resolved us, whether this light be substantial, corporal, or incorporeal: Corporal they say it cannot be, because then it could neither pierce the ayre, nor those hard, solid, and Diaphanous bodies, which it doth; and yet every day we see the ayre illighted: Incorporeal it cannot be, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the Fathers is esteemed. Others say (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, because no form so excellent as it self to inform it: neither can it be an accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subject: for light being taken from the Sun, the Sun is no more the Sun in existence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and form, then either, or both must be one of these, lucid or bright, dark or opaque; Diaphanous or transparent; but darkness cannot be parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light nor darkness, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or form, or both, be lucid and shining. Lucid and shining obtain their so being of the light; and therefore if we derive this being of light from a former, then would the progress go on infinitely and against nature; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the Sun hath his being primarily, and immediately of it self, and is therefore the Suns form, and the form of all lucid and shining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others judge.

But in my understanding, Lumen (which may be Englished by the word shine) is an intentional Species of that, which may be Englished by Lights; and so, this shining which proceedeth from the Sun, or other lights of Heaven, or from any other light, is an Image, or intentional Species thereof; and an intentional Species may be understood by example of a red or green colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sun through red or green glass: for then we perceive the same colour cast upon any thing opposite; which redness or other colour, we call the intentional Species ties of the colour in that glass. And again, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet understood: so it is dispersed, whether this light first created, be the same which the Sun inhaleth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer than till the Suns creation.

But by the most wife and unchanged order, which God observed in the works of the World, I gather, that the Light, in the first day created, was the substance of the Sun: for Moses repeateth twice the main parts of the Universal: first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were adorned with form: first, naming the Heavens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused; and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made dry Land; and the Heavens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was uncovered, and before it was called Arida, or dry Land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their virtual forms: So the Sun although it had not its formal perfection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (under the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day united, and set in the Firmament of Heaven: for, to Light created in the first day God gave no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation (which was to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisdom of God find cause why it should move (by which motion, days and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by moving, the Sun might give light, heat, and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herb, &c. God caused the Sun to move, and (by interchange of time) to visit every part of the inferior World; by his heat to stir up the fire of generation, and to give activity to the seeds of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that use and end, to which it was ordered; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerful Word he approved, and approving it, disposed thereof, to the use and comfort of his future Creatures.

But in that it pleased God to ask of Job, By what way is the Light parted, and where is the way where Light dwelleth? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not under mans understanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by Gods grace we enjoy the effects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (saith Eldras.) And those which inhabit the Heavens, do only know the Essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in celo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing unknown in Heaven, nothing perfectly known on Earth. Res vere sunt in mundo invisibiles; in mundo visibiles umbra rerum: Things themselves are in the invisible World; in the world visible, but their shadows. Surely, if this Light be not spiritual, yet it approacheth nearest unto spirituality; and if it have any corporality, then of all other the most subtle and pure; for howsoever, it is of all things seen, the most beautiful, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficial. For it ministereth unto men, and other creatures, all celestial influences; it dissipateth those sad thoughts and sorrows, which the darkness both begetteth and maintaineth; it discovereth unto us the glorious works of God, and carrieth up with an Angelical swiftness, our eyes unto Heaven, that by the sight thereof, our minds being informed of his visible marvels, may continually travel to surmount these perceived Heavens, and to find out their omnipotent Cause and Creator. *Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis: Our knowledge doth not quiet itself in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cetera mundi membra digna sit laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communi- cet: It is the Light (saith Saint Ambrose) that maketh the other parts of the world so worthy of praise, seeing that it itself communicateth its goodness and beauty unto all. Of which, Ovid out of Orpheus:*

*Ille ego sum, qui longum metior annum, Omnia qui viduo, per quem videt omnia
Mundi oculus.*

The world discerns it self, while I the World behold,
By me the longest years, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Lastly, If we may behold in any creature, any one spark of that eternal fire, or any far-off dawning of Gods glorious brightness, the same in the beauty, motion, and virtue of this Light, may be perceived. Therefore was God called Lux ipsa, and the Light, by Hermes, named Lux sancta, and Christ our Saviour said to be that Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect respect of Gods incomprehensible sublimity, and purity, this is also true, that God is neither a mind, nor a Spirit of the nature of other Spirits; nor a light, such as can be discerned. *Deus profecto non mens est, at vero ut sit mens causa est; nec spiritus, sed causa quod spiritus extat; nec lumen, sed causa quod lumen existit: God (saith Hermes in Poemandro) certainly is not a mind, but the cause that the mind hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.*

So then the Mafs and Chaos being first created, void, dark, and unformed, was by the operative Spirit of God, pierced and quickened; and the Waters, having now received Spirit and motion, resolved their thinner parts into Ayr, which God illightned: the Earth also by being contiguous, and mixt with waters (participating the same divine virtue) brought forth the bud of the herb that feedeth seed, &c. And for a mean and organ, by which this operative virtue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be united, and gave it also motion and heat, which heat caused a continuance of those several species, which the Earth (being made fruitful by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begat the time and times succeeding.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Crystalline Heaven, or any Primum mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a Firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarification and evaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters, separate above this Extension, which the Latine Translation calleth firamentum, or expansum (for so Vatablus, Pagninus, and Jamus turn it) are not the Crystalline Heavens created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Basilus Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the same place many learned arguments against this infancie. For the waters above the firmament, are the waters in the ayr above us, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the neather waters by a firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the words Raquia (which Antonius writeth Rakingb), and Sbaumajim, being indifferently taken for the heaven and for ayr, and more properly for the ayr and Fiber, then for the heavens, as the best Hebricians understand them, Quo suprema ac tenuia ab inferioris crustis diducta, inter seque different, for that whereby the supreme and thin bodies were placed in distance, being severed and cut off from low and gross matters: and the waters above the firmament, exprest in the word Majim, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters above the ayr, or in the uppermost region of the same.

And that the word Heaven is used for the Ayr, the Scriptures every where witness; as in the blessings of Joseph, and in the 104. Psalm: * By these Springs shall the fowl of the Heaven dwell; and upon Sodom and Gomorrah it rained brimstone and fire out of the Heaven; and in Isaacs blessing to Jacob, God gave thee therefore of the dew of Heaven; and in Deuteronomy the 11. But the land whither you go to possess it, is a land that drinketh water of the rayne of Heaven; and in Job, Who hath ingendred the frosts of Heaven? and in S. Matthew, Behold the Fowls of Heaven, for they sow not. So as in all the Scriptures of the Old Testament throughout, is the word Heaven very oft used for Ayr, and taken also hyperbolically for any great Height, as, Let us build us a Tower, whose top may reach to Heaven, &c. And in this very place Basil avoucheth, that this appellation of Heaven for the Firmament, is but by way of similitude: his own words be these; *Et vocavit Deus firmamentum celum. Hec appellatio alii quidem proprie accommodatur, huic autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the firmament Heaven: This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applied to another (that is to the Starry Heaven) but to this (that is, to the firmament dividing the waters) it is imposed by similitude. And if there were no other proof, that by the Firmament was meant the Ayr, and not the Heaven, the words of Moses in the eighth verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentieth verse, make it manifest: for in the eighth verse it is written, that God called the Firmament, which divided waters from waters, Heaven; and in the twentieth verse he calleth the Firmament of Heaven, Ayr; in these words, And let the Fowl fly upon the earth in the operfirmament of Heaven. And what use there should be of this ycie, or crystalline, or waterie Heaven, I conceive not, except it be to moderate and temper the heat, which the Primum mobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in very truth, instead of this help, it would add an unmeasurable greatnes of circle, whereby the swiftness of that first Moveable would exceed all possibility of belief. *sed nemo creatur ad impossibilia; but no man ought ought to be held to impossibilities: and faith is felt (which furnormeth the height of all humane reason) hath for a forcible conductor the Word of Truth, which also may be called lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; the light of all reason and understanding. Now that this supposed first Moveable, in an instant (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those that can believe mens imagination, apprehend it; for I cannot. But of these many Heavens, let the Reader that desireth satisfaction, search Orontius; and of this waterie Heaven, Basilus Magnus, in his Hexam. fol. 40. 41. &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, in his second Book and sixth chapter. For my self, I am perfwaded, that the waters called, The waters above the Heavens, are but the clouds and waters engendered in the uppermost ayr.

A Conclusion, repeating the sum of the works in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise God in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or Being, but Gods incomprehensible eternity. First, he created the matter of all things; and in the first three dayes he distinguished, and gave to every nature his proper form; the form of heavie to that which ascended; to that which descended, the form of gravity: for he separated light from darkness, divided waters from waters, and gathered the waters under the firmament into one place. In the last three days, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the World: he set in the Firmament of Heaven, the Sun, Moon, and Starrs; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Ayre with Fowl, and the Sea with Fish, giving to all that have life a power generative, thereby to continue their Species, and kindsto Creatures vegetative and growing, their Seeds in themselves; for he created all things, that they might have their being: and the generations of the world are preserved.

That Nature, is no Principium per se; nor Form, the giver of being: and of our ignorance how second causes should have any proportion with their effects.

And for this working-power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle, the same is nothing else, but the strength and faculty, which God hath infused into every creature, having no other selfe-ability, then a Clock, after it is wound up by a mans hand, hath. Those therefore that attribute unto this faculty, any first or sole power, have therein no other understanding, then such a one hath who, looking into the Stern of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helm and Rudder, doth ascribe some absolute virtue to the peece of wood, without all consideration of the hand that guides it, or of the judgment, which also directeth and commandeth that hand: forgetting in this and in all else, that by the virtue of the first act, all Agents work whatsoever they work: Virtute primi actus, agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt; for as the mind of man seeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the ears, and maketh choise by the will: and therefore we attribute sight to the eye, and hearing to the ears, &c. and yet it is the mind only, that giveth ability, life, and motion to all these his instruments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sun, by the Starrs, by Nature or infused properties, and by men as by several Organs, several effects; all second causes whatsoever, being but instruments, conduits, and pipes, which carry and disperse what they have received from the head and fountain of the Universal. For as it is Gods infinite power, and everywhere-prefence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giveth to the Sun power to draw up vapours, to be made clouds; clouds to contain rain, and rain to fall: so all second and instrumental causes together with Nature it self, without that operative faculty which God gave them, would become altogether silent, virtuelles, and dead: of which excellently Orpheus says, Per te virescunt omnia, All things by thee spring forth in youthful green. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable virtues which God hath given to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heavenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all His works in their virtues praise him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philosophers, and those that follow them, have taken on them to teach: I say, there is not any one among them, nor any one among us, that could ever yet conceive it, or express it, ever enrich his own understanding with any certain truth, or ever edifie others (not foolishly by selfe-flattery) therein. For (saith Laetantius, speaking of the wisdom of the Philosophers) Si facultas invenienda veritatis huic studio subjaceret, aliquando esset inventa;

§. XI.

Of Fate; and that the Starrs have great influence: and that their operations may diversely be prevented or furthered.

And, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that have written thereof, may be safely received, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an inevitable necessity, and made it more general, and universally powerful then it is, by giving it Dominion over the mind of man, and over his will, of which Ovid, and Juvenal:

Juv. l. d. 7. 101.

Gainst Fate no counsell can prevail,
Kingdoms to Slaves by Destinie,
To Captives triumphs given be,

An error of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillianists, the Bardianists, and others, as Basil, Augustine, and Thomas have observed: but that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceived of Hermes, and Aplous the Platonist. Plotinus out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestial Orbs, unchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things which a rational mind doth not order nor direct. Ptolemie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and inevitable necessity; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de unoquoque nostrum fatum est Deus) and the definite lot of all living. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Starrs are instruments of far greater use, then to give an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sunset: it being manifest, that the diversity of seasons, the Winters, and Summers, more hot and cold, are not so uncertain by the Sun and Moon alone, who alway keep one and the same course; but that the Starrs have also their working therein.

And if we cannot deny, but that God hath given virtues to Springs and Fountains, to cold Earth, to Plants and Stones, Minerals, and to the excremental parts of the basest living creatures, why should we rob the beautiful Starrs of their working powers? for seeing they are many in number, and of eminent

*tas, cum vero tot temporibus, tot ingenis in ejus inquisitione contritiis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam; If in this studie (saith he), were means to find out the truth, it had ere this bin found out: but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits have been worn out in the inquiry of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisdom there to be had. Nam si de una re precisa scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessariò haberetur: If the precise knowledge of any one thing were to be had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the Philosphers were ignorant in Nature, and the waies of her working; so were they more curious, then knowing, in their first matter and Phisical form. For if their first matter had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaveth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take concurrence, it hath not been taught, neither are these forms (saith a learned Author) any thing, sex ea exprimitur potentia, que nihil est. Again, how this first matter should be substantia formarum, and passive, which is understood to precede the form, it is hard to conceive: for to make form, which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrary to all reason, divine and humane: only it may be said, that originally there is no other difference between matter and form, then between heat and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kind of orational consideration. Leaving therefore these Riddles to their Lovers, who by certain Scholastical distinctions wrest and pervert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to prove a false eternity of the World, I think it farr safer to affirm with Saint Augustine, That all species and kinds are from God, from whom, whatsoever is natural proceedeth, of what kind or estimation soever; from whence are the seeds of all forms, and the forms of all seeds and their motions; A quo est omnis species, a quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cujusque generis est, cujusque estimationis est; a quo sunt semina formarum, forme seminum, motus seminum atque formarum. And thus much Averrois is forced to confess. For all forms (saith he) are, in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus upon Dionysius.*

nent beauty and magnitude, we may not think, that in the treasury of his wisdom, who is infinite, there can be wanting (even for every Star) a peculiar virtue and operation; as every herb, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to cover and shadow her dusty face, but otherwise for the use of man and beast, to feed them and cure them; so were not those uncountable glorious bodies set in the Firmament, to no other end, then to adorn it; but for Instruments and Organs of his divine Providence, so far as it hath pleased his just will to determine. Origen upon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in

Gen. 1. 3. the Firmament, &c. affirmeth, that the Stars are not causes (meaning per chance binding causes;) but are as open Books, wherein are contained and set down all things whatsoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wisdom: which latter part I believe well, and this saying of Syrracides with-Eccles. 49. all: That there are hid yet greater things, than
ch. 32. these be, and we have seen but a few of his works.

And though, for the capacity of men, we know somewhat, yet in the true and uttermost virtues of herbs and plants, which our selves sow and set, and which grow under our feet, we are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestial bodies. For hardly (saith Solomon) can we discern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour find we out those things that are before us: Who can then investigate the things that are in Heaven? Adulium est, de rebus celestibus aliquid cognoscere: It is much to know a little of heavenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heavens we do not bind God to his creatures, in this supposed necessity of Destiny; so on the contrary, we do not rob those beautiful creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of these second causes deplored God of his Prerogative, or had God himself constrained the mind and will of man to impious acts by any celestial inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some, were justifiable; of whom S. Augustine, Impia peruersitate in malis factis resistunt reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potius Auctorem Syderum, quam commissorem scelorum; Where we reprehend them of evil deeds, they again with wicked peruerseness urge, that rather the Author and Creator of the Stars, than the doer of the evil, is to be accused.

But that the Stars and other celestial bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitive appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. *Corpora celestia (saith Damascene) constituent in nobis habitus, complexiones, & dispositiones. The heavenly bodies (saith he) make in us habits, complexiones, and dispositions; for the body (though Galen enforce it further) hath undoubtedly a kind of drawing after it the affections of the mind, especially bodies strong in humour, and weak in virtues; for those of cholerick complexion are subject to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselves to be transported, where the Mind hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her Vallais, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonless mind, I am resolved: For all those which were created mortal, as birds, beasts, and the like, are left to their natural appetites; over all which, celestial bodies (as instruments and executioners of Gods providence) have absolute dominion. What we should judge of men, who little differ from beasts, cannot tell; for as he that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them; so whosoever shall neglect the remedies by virtue and piety prepared, putteth himself altogether under the power of his sensual appetite; *Vincitur fatum si resistis, vincit si contempsis, Fate will be overcome, if thou resist it; if thou neglect it, conquereth.

But that either the Stars or the Sun have any power over the minds of men immediately, it is absurd to think, other then as aforesaid, as the same by the body's temper may be effected. *Lumen solis ad generationem sensibilibus corporum confert, & adiuvant ipsam movet & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the Sun (saith S. Augustine) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moveth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidem est sol, in ministerio, non imperio. The Sun is good to serve, not to sway perio. The Sun is good to serve, not to sway perio. And S. Augustine, *Deus regit (saith S. Ambrose.) And S. Augustine, Deus regit inferiora corpora per superiora, God ruleth the bodies below by those above; but he avoucheth not, that superior bodies have rule over mens minds, which are incorporeal.

But howsoever we are by the Stars inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation; and Aristotle himself confesseth, that the Heavens do not always work their effects in inferior bodies no more then the signs of rain and wind do always come to pass. And it is divers times seen, that paternal virtue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Est in juvenis Patrum virtus, In the young Off-spring of the Fathers virtue is, and so the contrary, Patrum trum vitia: and herein also there is often found an interchange; the Sons of virtuous men, by an ill constellation become inclinable to vice, and of vicious men to virtue.

Egregia est soboles scelcrato nata parente:

A worthy son is born of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods reserved power) that so much letteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as Education doth: for there are none in the World so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing up, may fashion anew and reform them; nor any so well disposed, whom (the reins being let loose) the continual fellowship and familiarity, and the examples of dissolute men, may not corrupt and deform. Vessels will ever retain a favour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult either to cleanse the mind once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet favour of virtue first received, when the mind was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a favourable constellation (allowing that the Stars incline the will) and a virtuous education do happily arrive, or the contrary in both, thereby it is that men are found so exceeding virtuous or vicious, Heaven and Earth (as it were) running together and agreeing in one: for as the seeds of virtue may by the art and husbandry of Christian counsel produce better and more beautiful fruit, then the strength of Self-nature and Kind could have yielded them; so the plants apt to grow wild, and to change themselves into weeds, by being set in a soyl suitable, and like themselves, are made more unfavourable and filled with poison. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapiens adjuvabit opus Agrorum, quemadmodum Agricola terra naturam; A wise man assisteth the work of the Stars, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the soyl. And Ptolemy himself confesseth thus much, Sapiens, & omnia sapientis Medici, dominabuntur Astris; A wise man, and the omniscient art of a wise Physician shall prevail against the Stars. Lastly, we ought all to know, that God created the Stars, as he did the rest of the Universal; whose influences may be called his reserved and unwritten Laws. But let us consider how they bind: even as the Laws of men do; for although the Kings and Princes of the World have by their Laws decreed, that a Thief and a Murderer shall suffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Judges and Magistrates (the Stars of Kings) executed accordingly; yet these Laws do not deprive Kings of their natural or religious compassion, or bind them without prerogative, to such a severe execution, as that there should be nothing left of liberty to judgment, power, or conscience: the Law in his own nature, being no other then a deaf Tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) do sometimes for causes to themselves known, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves; it were then impious to take that power and liberty from God himself, which his Substitutes enjoy; God being mercy, goodness, and charity itself. Otherwise that example of Prayer by our Saviour taught; And let us not be led into temptation, but deliver us from evil, had been no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which only knoweth the operation of his own creatures truly) hath assured us, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble Prayers and Desires may not make frustrate and break afunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceive) that Fate or Destiny, though depending upon eternal power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependency, that God himself should in a kind have shut up himself therein; *How miserable then were the condition of men (saith S. Augustine) left altogether without hope.*

And if this strength of the Stars were so transferred, as that God had quitted unto them all dominion over his creatures; be he Pagan or Christian that so believeth, the only true God of the one, and the imaginary gods of the other, would thereby be deplored of all worship, reverence, or respect.

And certainly, God which hath promised us the reward of well-doing, which Christ himself claimed at the hands of the Father, (I have finished the work, which thou gavest me to do;) and the same God, who hath threatened unto us the sorrow and torment of offences, could not, contrary to his merciful nature, be so unjust, as to bind us inevitably to the Destinies or Influences of the Stars, or subject our souls to any imposed necessity. But it was well said of Plotinus, that the Stars were significant, but not efficient, giving them yet something less then their due: and therefore as I do not consent with them, who would make those glorious creatures of God virtueless: so I think that we derogate from His eternal and absolute power and providence, to ascribe to them the same dominion over our immortal souls, which they have over all bodily substances, and perishable natures: for the Souls of men loving and fearing God, receive influence from that divine light it self, whereof the Suns clarity, and that of the Stars, is by Plato called but a shadow. Lumen est umbra Dei, Deus est lumen luminis. Light is the shadow of Gods brightness, who is the light of light: But to end this question, because this Destiny, together with Providence, Precedence, and Predisposition, are often confounded, I think it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two; for every man hath not observed it, though all learned men have.

§. XII.

Of Precedence.

Precedence, or fore-knowledge (which the Greeks call Prognosis, the Latines præcognitio, or præscientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speak of God after the manner of men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Precedence is no other than an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatsoever our selves fore-know, except the same be to succeed accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Precedence of God (as it is Precedence only) is not the cause of any thing futurely succeeding: neither doth Gods fore-knowledge impose any necessity, or bind. For in that we fore-know that the Sun will rise, and set; that all men born in the World shall die again; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring, Summer, and Harvest; and that according to the several seeds that we sow, we shall reap several sorts of grain; yet is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neither doth the knowledge in us bind or constrain the Sun to rise and set, or men to die; for the causes (as men persuade themselves) are otherwise manifest and known to all. The eye of man (saith Boetius) beholdeth those things subject to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is an horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their own natures. And again out of the same Author; Divina providentia rebus generalis non imponit necessitatem, quia si omnia evenirent ex necessitate, premia bonorum, & poena malorum periret; Divine Providence (saith he) imposeth no necessity upon things that are to exist; for if all come to pass of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of evil.

§. XIII.

Of Providence.

Now Providence (which the Greeks call Pronoia) is an intellectual knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not only behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Precedence (simply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philosophers (saith S. Augustine) is divided into Memory, Knowledge, and Care: Memory of the past; Knowledge of the present; and Care of the future: and we our selves account such a man for provident, as, remembering things past, and observing things present, can by judgment, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the future, and times succeeding. That such a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures every where teach us; Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions, Christ himself and his Apostles assure us hereof; and besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Empedocles, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Providence of God; yea the Turks themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other in the most pestilential diseases, nor shun any peril whatsoever, though death therein do manifestly present it self.

The places of Scripture proving Providence, are so many, both in general and particular, as I shall need to repeat but a few of them in this place: sing unto God (saith David) which covereth the Heavens with clouds, and prepareth rain for the earth, and maketh the grass to grow upon the Mountains, which giveth the beasts their food, and feedeth the young Raven that cries: All these wait upon thee; that thou mayest give them food in due season: And thou shalt drink of the River Cleaver: (saith God to Elisha) and I have commanded the Ravens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowls of the Air, they sow not, nor reap, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: Again, Are not two Sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea, all the hairs of your head are numbered: And S. Peter, Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you: And his judgments are written, saith David.

God therefore, who is every where present. Who filleth the Heavens and the Earth, whose eyes are upon the righteous, and his countenance against them that do evil, was therefore by Orpheus called oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things; and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on.

as if he had transferred his power to any other; for it is contrary to his own word, Gloriam meam alteri non dabo, I will not give my glory to another. No man commandeth in the Kings presence, but by the Kings direction; but God is every where present, and King of Kings. The example of Gods universal Providence is seen in his creatures. The Father provideth for his children: beasts and birds and all livings, for their young ones. If Providence be found in second Fathers, much more in the first and Universal: and if there be a natural loving care in men, and beasts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whose Divine love was the beginning, and is the bond of the Universal: Amor divinus verum omnium est principium, & vinculum universi (saith Plato;) Amor Dei est nodus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumque ejus immobile sustentaculum, ac universæ machine fundamentum; The love of God is the perpetual knot, and link or chain of the world, and the immovable pillar of every part thereof; and the Basis and foundation of the Universal. God therefore who could only be the cause of all, can only provide for all, and sustain all; so as to absolute power; to every where presence; to perfect goodness; to pure and divine love; this attribute transcendent habili-ty of Providence is only proper and belonging.

§. XIV.

Of Predisposition.

Now for Predisposition, we can differ-ence it no otherwise, from Providence and Precedence, then in this; that Precedence only fore-seeeth; Providence fore-seeeth and careth for, and hath respect to all creatures, even from the brightest Angels of Heaven to the unworthiest Worms of the Earth: and Predisposition (as it is used specially by Divines) is only of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their salvation properly, in the common use of Divines; or perdition, as some have used it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernardus Theologus, and others, take the word Predisposition more strictly, and for a preparation to felicity. Divers of the Fathers take it more largely sometimes; among whom Saint Augustine speaking of two Cities, and two Societies, useth these words, Quarum est una, quæ prædestinata est in æternum regnare cum Deo, altera æternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo; Whereof one is it, which is predisposition to reign for ever with God, but the other is to undergo everlasting torment with the Devil; for according to Nonius Marcellus, Definare, est præparare; and of the same opinion are many Protestant Writers, as Caldern, Beza, Lucanus, Danans, and such like: and as for the manifold questions herof arising, I leave them to the Divines; and why it hath pleased God to create some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour, I will answer with Gregory, who saith, Qui in suis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerat, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his own infirmity, perceiveth the reason of his blindness. And again, with S. Augustine, Oculi esse causa potest, injusti esse non potest; Hidden the cause of his Predisposition may be, unjust it cannot be.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seem to be by Fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

Astly, seeing Destiny or Necessity is subsequent to Gods Providence, and seeing that the Stars have no other dominion, then is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificium Dei Organum, The art, or artificial Organ of God: and Cusanus, Drusius, perceive infirmity; The instrument of the divine precept: we may then with better reason reject that kind of Idolatry, or God of fools, called, Fortune or Chance; a Goddes, the most revered, and the most reviled of all other, but not ancient: for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Messenackes. The Greeks call her Toxoté, signifying a relative being, or betiding, so as before Homer's time this great Lady was scarce heard of; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit gods, hath not a word of Fortune; yet afterward the grew to great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdoms, to Beggars and Cottages, the ordered all things; relishing the wisdom of the wife, by making the Possessor thereof miserable; valuing the folly of the most foolish, by making the successful prosperous: in sum, as the actions of men were said to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens lives, but her pastimes; of which Palladius, Vita hominum ludus fortune est; The life of man is the play of Fortune: and because it often falleth out, that enterprisers guided by ill counsels, have equal success to those by the best judgment conducted, therefore had Fortune the same external figure with Sapience; whereof Athenicus:

of the Stars, is by Plato called but a shadow. Lumen est umbra Dei, Deus est lumen luminis; Light is the shadow of Gods brightness, who is the light of Light: But to end this question, because this Destiny, together with Providence, Precedence, and Predetermination, are often confounded, I think it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two; for every man hath not observed it, though all learned men have.

§. XII.

Of Precedence.

Precedence, or fore-knowledge (which the Greeks call Prognosis, the Latines præcognitio, or præscientia) considered in order and nature (as we may speak of God after the manner of men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Precedence is no other then an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatsoever our selves fore-know, except the same be to succeed accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Precedence of God (as it is Precedence only) is not the cause of any thing futrely succeeding: neither doth Gods fore-knowledge impose any necessity, or bind. For in that we fore-know that the Sun will rise, and let; that all men born in the World shall die again; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring, Summer, and Harvest; and that according to the several seeds that we sow, we shall reap several sorts of grain; yet is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these; neither doth the knowledge in us bind or constrain the Sun to rise and set, or men to die; for the causes (as men persuade themselves) are otherwise manifest and known to all. The eye of man (saith Boetius) beholdeth those things subject to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is an horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their own nature. And again out of the same Author; Divina providentia rebus generandis non imponit necessitatem, quia si omnia evenirent ex necessitate, premia bonorum, & poena malorum periret: Divine Providence (saith he) imposeth no necessity upon things that are to exist; for if all come to pass of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of evil.

§. XIII.

Of Providence.

Now Providence (which the Greeks call Pronoia) is an intellectual knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Precedence (simply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philosophers (saith S. That such a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures every where teach us; Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions, Christ himself and his Apostles assure us hereof; and besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Providence of Gods; yea the Turks themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other in the most pestilent diseases, nor shun any peril whatsoever, though death therein do manifestly present it self.

The places of Scripture proving Providence, are so many, both in general and particular, as I shall need to repeat but a few of them in this place: Sing unto God (saith David) which covereth the Heavens with clouds, and prepareth rain for the earth, and maketh the grass to grow upon the Mountains, which giveth the beasts their food, and feedeth the young Ravens thus cries: All these wait upon thee, that thou mayest give them food in due season: And thou shalt drink of the River cleareth (saith God to Elisha) and I have commanded the Ravens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowls of the Air, they sow not, nor reap, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: Again, Are not two Sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea, all the hairs of your head are numbered: And S. God therefore, who is every where present, Who filleth the Heavens and the Earth, whose eyes are upon the righteous, and his countenance against them that do evil, was therefore by Orpheus called oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things; and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on.

as if he had transferred his power to any other: for it is contrary to his own word, Gloriam meam alteri non dabo, I will not give my glory to another. No man commandeth in the Kings presence, but by the Kings direction; but God is every where present, and King of Kings. The example of Gods universal Providence is seen in his creatures. Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seem to be by Fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

Lastly, seeing Destiny or Necessity is subsequent to Gods Providence, and seeing that the Stars have no other dominion, then is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but, as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificijum Dei Organum, The art, or artificial Organ of God: and Cusanus, Divini præcepti instrumentum; The instrument of the divine precept: we may then with better reason reject that kind of Idolatry, or God of fools, called, Fortune or Chance; a Goddess, the most revered, and the most reviled of all other, but not ancient: for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Messeniacus. From Wiſdom Fortune differs far,
And yet in works most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly understood) is nothing else but a power imaginary, to which the successes of human actions and endeavours were for their variety ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be given, then was it attributed to Fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant; contrary to this true ground of Plato, Nihil est ortum sub Sole, cujus causa legitima non preceſſerit; Nothing ever came to pass under the Sun, of which there was not a just preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatsoever may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, besides the intention of the Inferior, but not besides the intention of the Superior; Præter intentionem Inferioris, sed non præter intentionem Superioris (to wit, the ordinance of God;) and therefore (saith

Tr. secundus Metaphisichon Quod poete Fortunam, non Deum appellamus; whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God. And that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth us; as in the Law of Murder, He that smiteth a man, and he die, shall die the death; and if a man hath not laid wait, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these words, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, If he hurt him by Chance; and in Dentonomy the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Ax from the helve, whereby another is slain, was the work of God himself; we in our phrase attribute this accident, to Chance or Fortune: and in

Prov. 1. Proverbs the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casual and subject to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicks, to this effect, That the same power which they called Animum mundi; The soul of the World, was no other than that incomprehensible Wiſdom, which we express by the name of God, governing every Being as well in heaven as in earth; to which Wiſdom and Power they sometime gave the title of Necessity or Fate, because it bindeth by inevitable ordinance: sometime, the style of Fortune, because of many effects there appear unto us no certain causes. To this effect speaketh S. Augustine in his questions upon Genesis the first Book: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was: For whatsoever (saith he) thou calleſt God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, differenced by divers terms, according as he useth, and exerciseth his power diversly.

But it may be objected, That if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of good and evil in men, but an idle voice, whereby we express success; how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depend upon so many unworthy and empty-headed fools? that riches and honour are given to external men, and without kernel; and so many learned, virtuous, and valiant men wear out their lives in poor and dejected estates? In a word, there is no other inferior, or apparent cause, beside the partiality of mans affection, but the fashioning and not fashioning of our selves according to the nature of the times wherein we live: for whoſoever is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath withal an honest and open heart and loving truth; if Princes, or those that govern, endure no other discourse than their own flatteries: then, I say, such an one, whose virtue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall evermore hang under the wheel; which kind of deserving well and receiving ill, we always fallily charge Fortune withal. For whoſoever shall tell any great Man or Magistrate, that he is not Just; the General of an Army, that he is not valiant; and great Ladies that they are not fair; shall never be made a Counsellor, a Captain, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wise with a wise Prince, valiant with a valiant, and just with him that is just, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperity; but he must also change with the successor, if he be of contrary qualities; fall with the tyde of the time, and alter form and condition, as the Estate or the Estate's Master changeth: Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attain to honour and riches, but by such an obsequious slavish course? These men having nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kind of wondering at other men, and by making them believe that all their virtues, and all their duty actions crystalline, have yet in all ages prospered equally with the most virtuous, if not exceeded them. For, according to Menander, Omnia insipientis, arrogantia & planissimis capitur; Every fool is

wonne with his own pride, and others flattering applause: so as whoſoever will live altogether out of himselfe, and study other mens humours; and observe them, shall never be unfortunate; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and virtue (except the season wherein he liveth be of all these,
and of all sorts of goodness, fruitful) shall never prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to war or contend in vain against the nature of times wherein he liveth: for such a one is often the author of his own misery; but best it were to follow the advice, which the Pope gave the Bishop of that age, out of Ovid, while the Arian Heretic raged:

Ovid. Met. Dum furor in cursu est, currenti cede furari.
While fury gallops on the way,
Let no man furie's gallop stay.

And if Cicero (then whom that world begat not a man of more reputed judgement) had followed the counsel of his Brother Quintus, Potuisse (saith Petrarch) in lulo suo mori, potuisse integro cadavere sepeliri;
He might then have died the death of nature, and been with an untimely and discovered body buried; for, as Petrarch in the same place noteth Quid scilicet quam desperantem, præ-sertim ad effectum (I shew perpetuis implicari?

What more foolish then for him that despairs (especially of the effect) to be entangled with endless contentions? Whoſoever therefore will let before him Machiavel's two marks to shoot at, (to wit) Riches, and Glory, mult let on and take off a back of yron to a weak wood-den Bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble; for as he who first devised to add sails to rowing vessels, did either by proportion them as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all winds and storms, or else he sometime or other perished by his own invention: so that man which prizeth virtue for it selfe, and cannot endure to hoyle and strike his sails, as the divers natures of calmes and storms require, must cut his sails and his cloth of mean length and breadth, and content himself with a slow and sure navigation, (to wit) a mean and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the rest, or whatsoever Lords or Gods, imaginary powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishness) of man hath found out: let us resolve with S. Paul, who hath taught us, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diversities of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all.

CHAP. II.

Of Man's estate in his first Creation, and of God's rest.

S. I.

Of the Image of God, according to which man was first created.

*Sanctus his animal, mensisq; capacis alia,
Dedit ad hunc, & quod dominari ceteris

Natus homo est.

The creation of all other creatures being finished, the heavens adorned, and the earth replenished, God said, Let us make man in our own Image, according to our likeness.
Man is the last and most admirable of God's works to us known: Ingens miraculum out of Metaphysics 1. Natura ardentissime artificium. The artificial work of the most ardent or fire-like nature (as saith Zoroaster) though the same be meant, not for any excellency external, but in respect of his internal form, both in the Nature, Qualities, and other Attributes thereof: in nature, because he hath an essence, immortal, and spiritual, in qualities, because the same was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, because man was made Lord of the world, and of the creatures therein.

More holy then the rest, and understanding more.
A living creature wants, to rule all made before:
So man began to be.

Of this Image and Similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, School-men, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceive that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as S. Chrysostom, Ambrose, and some others: which S. Ambrose denieth to the woman in these words, *Ut sicut Deus unus, ad co foret homo unus; & quomodo ex Deo uno

*omnia, ita ex uno homine omne genus esset super faciem totius terre: unus igitur, unum fecit, qui unitatis ejus haberet imaginem; That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kind should be upon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one, made one, that should have the Image of his unity. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the same Verse, that man was after the Image of God in respect of rule and power; it is written. Dominamini in the plural numbers, and let them rule over the fish in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceive, that Man is said to be after the Image of God in respect of his immortal soul only: because as God is invisible, so the soul of man is invisible; as God is immortal and incorporeal, so is the soul of Man immortal and incorporeal; and as there is but one God which governeth the world, so but one soul which governeth the body of man; and as God is wholly in every part of the world, so is the soul of man wholly in every part of the body: Animus est totus in toto, & tota in quolibet parte; The soul is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in every part thereof, according to Aristotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men deny that doctrine; which that it is otherwise then potentially true, all the Aristotelians in the world shall never prove. These and the like arguments do the Jews make (saith Tostatus) and these resemblances, between the infinite God, and the finite Man.*

The School-men resemble the Mind or Soul of Man to God, in this respect especially; because that as in the Mind there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memory, Understanding, and Will; and yet all these, being of real differences, are but one Mind: so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude diverse; and again, they distinguish between Imaginem Dei, and ad Imaginem Dei, and spin into small threads with subtle distinctions, many times the plainness and sincerity of the Scriptures: their wits being like that strong water, that eateth thorow and dissolveth the purest gold. Visiorinus also maketh the Image of God to be substantial, but not the similitude: Sed in substantia uenem qualitatis declarationum; A word declaring quality in the substance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inferred, that as the Image and Similitude do greatly differ, so the simul soul doth not therefore leave to be the Image of God; but it hath not his Similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Augustine also against Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by sin, the perfection of this Image is lost in man; and in his Retractions maintaineth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, then the Image.

But howsoever the School-men and others distinguish, or whatsoever the Fathers conceive, sure I am, that S. Paul maketh the same sense of the Image, which Visiorinus doth of the similitude, who saith: As we have born the image of the earthy, so shall we bear the image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scripture, that the words Image and similitude were used but in one sense, and in this place the better to express each other; whatsoever Lombard hath said to the contrary. For God knows, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himself in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, ever conceived. Now as S. Paul useth the word (Image) for both: so Saint James useth the word (Similitude) for both, in these words: Therewith bless we God even the Father, and therewith curse we Men, which are made after the similitude of God. Howsoever therefore S. Augustine seemeth, out of a kind of elegance in writing, to make some difference: as where he writeth, Constituimus imaginem in eternitate, similitudinem in moribus inveniri; we confess that this image is made in eternity, but his similitude in manners; that is in the spiritual dispositions and qualities of the mind; yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly: Quasi autem verum possit esse imago aliqua, in qua similitudo super non sit: si enim omnino similis non est, procul dubio nec imago est; As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeness, there is no image. The very words of the Text make this most manifest, as, Let us make man in our image, according to our likeness: which is, Let us make man in our image; that he may be like us: and in the next Verse following, God himself maketh it plain; for there he useth the word (Image) only as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguity, in the fifth Verse of the fifth Chapter, the word (Similitude) is used again by it self, as, In the day that God created Adam, in the likeness of God made he him. And this similitude S. Paul, Colos. the third, calleth the Image; Put on (saith he) the new man which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him. And in Syriac it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may believe S. Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoolmen, then it is as manifest as words can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same; for S. Paul useth both the words directly in one sense. For they turned the glory of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zacharias laboureth to prove, that Man was formed after the image of God, both in body and mind: Nulla pars in homine, que non fuerit hujusce imaginis particeps; No part in a man (saith he) which was not participating God image; for God said, Let us make man according to our own image. But the soul alone is not man, but the hypostasis or whole Man compounded of body and soul. The body of man (saith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore microcosmus; but the idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his body, must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his own objection seemeth to me sufficient, where he allegeth that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure synecdoche. As when a man is called a mortal man, yet is not the whole man mortal, but the body only: so when God said, Let us make man after our image, he meant the soul of man, and not the body of earth and dust: Maledictus qui Deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (saith S. Augustine): Cursed is he that reffereth the Deity of God to the lineaments of mans body: Dens enim non est humane forme particeps, neque corpus humanum divina (saith Philo): God is not partaker of humane form, nor humane body of the form divine. The Hebrew word for image, is tsalem, which signifieth a shadow or obscure resemblance: In imagine pertransit homo; Man passeth away in a shadow: Let us then know and consider, that God, who is eternal and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition; for it is both against his Nature and his Word; an error of the Anthropomorphite, against the very essence and Majesty of God.

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more divine understanding then these gross Heretics: Ad similitudinem Dei propriis accedebat humana virtus, quam figura; The virtue which is in man (saith he) came nearer the similitude of God then the figure. For God is a spiritual substance, invisible, and most simple; God is a just God, God is Merciful, God is Charity it self, and (in a word) Goodness it self, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himself to teach us, and to make us know of himself. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherein can man be said to resemble his unexceivable power and perfectness? Certainly, not in Dominion alone; for the Devil is said to be the Prince of this World, and the Kingdom of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father; Neither because man hath an immortal soul, and therein the faculties of Memory, Understanding, and Will; for the Devils are also immortal, and participate those faculties, being called Demonies, because scientes of knowledge and subtilty: Neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts: For who have rebelled against God? Who have made gods of the vilest beasts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owls, yea, even of shameful parts, of lusts and pleasures, yet reasonable men? Yet do I not condemn the opinion of S. Chrysostom and Ambrose, as touching Dominion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Justice and Piety; for God did not only make man a Ruler and Governour over the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowls of Heaven (or of the air) and over the Beasts of the field; But God gave unto man a dominion over men, he appointed Kings to govern them, and Judges to judge them in equity. Neither do I exclude Reason, as it is the ability of Understanding. For I do not conceive, that Irenaeus did therefore call Man, the image of God, because he was animal rationale only; but that he understood it better, with sybilla; Imago mea est homo, rectam rationem habens; Man that is endued with right reason is said to resemble God (that is) by right reason to know and confess God his Creator, and the same God to serve, love, and obey: and therefore said S. Augustine (who herein came nearer the Truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & similitudinem suam in mente; God made man in respect of the intellect after his own image and similitude; and Reynerius, Homo, quid habet mentem, factus est ad imaginem Dei; Man was made after the image of God, in mind, or, in that he hath a mind.

§. II.

Of the Intellectual mind of man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by Sin.

BUT Adens is not taken here for anima physica, according to Aristotle, which is, forma vel natura hominis, The form or nature of man; but this faculty or gift of God, called Adens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principal strength of the mind, or soul, cujus actus est perpetua veritatis contemplatio; whose act, exercise, or office, is the perpetual contemplation of truth; and therefore it is also called intellectus divinus, intellectus contemplativus, & anima contemplativa, A divine understanding, and an intellect or mind contemplative. Est autem mens nostra (saith Chrysostom) vis comprehendendi virtutibus compositum: Our intellectual mind (saith he) is a power of comprehending; even the whole, that is in this kind powerful, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: unto which Mercurius attributeth so much (if his meaning accompany his words) that he esteemeth it to be the very essence of God (which was also the error of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwise separate from God (saith he) then the light from the Sun: for this Mens or understanding (saith Mercurius) est Deus in hominibus, is God in men; or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For, as the Sun is not of the same essence or nature with the divine light, but a body ill-lighted, and an illumination created; so is this Mens or understanding in men, not of the essence of Gods infinite understanding, but a power and faculty of our souls the purest; or, the lumen anime rationalis, by the true and eternal light ill-lighted. And this Mens, others call Animam animam, The soul of the soul, or, with S. Augustine, the eye of the soul, or receptacle of Sapience and divine Knowledge, que amorens sapientie tanquam ducem sequitur, Which followeth after the love of sapience as her guide (saith Philos;) between which and reason; between which and the mind, called anima; between which and that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference: Reason, is that faculty by which we judge and discourse; Anima, by which we live. Hereof it is said, Anima corpus animat, id est, vivificat; or, The soul is that which doth animate the body, that is, giveth it life; for death is the separation of body and soul: and the same strength (saith Philos) which God the great Director hath in the World, the same hath this Anima, or mind, or soul in Man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Basil agreeth, which called this Mens, or divine understanding, Perficiacum anime partem, The perceiving part of the mind, or, The light by which the soul discerneth: Dormientium mens, non anima, sopitur; & in furious mens extinguatur, anima manet: In men that sleep it is this (mens, or) understanding, and not the mind or soul, which resteth, during which time it is but habitual in wise men, and in mad men this (mens) is extinguished, and not the soul; for mad men do live, though distracted.

Therefore this word being often used for the Soul giving life, is attributed abusively to mad men, when we say that they are of a distracted mind, in stead of a broken understanding: which word (Mind) we use also for Opinion, as, I am of this mind, or, that mind: and sometimes for mens conditions or virtues, as, He is of an honest mind, or, a man of a just mind: sometimes for affection, as, I do this for my mind's sake: and Aristotle sometimes useth this word (Mens) for the phantasie, which is the strength of the imagination: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we have without discourse: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels; and Intelligences: but as it is used in the proper signification, including both the understanding agent and possible, it is described to be, A pure, simple, substantial act, not depending upon matter, but having relation to that which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large, thus: A part or particle of the Soul, whereby it doth understand, not depending upon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion coming from without, and apt to be disveiled, as, eternal from that which is mortal. Hereof excellently Mercurius, Anima est imago mentis, mens imago Dei, Deus menti præsens, mens animæ, anima corporis, The Soul (meaning that which giveth life) is the image of this understanding, or Mens; and this (Mens) or understanding, is the Image of God. God is President or Ruler over this understanding, this understanding over the Soul, and this Soul over the body. This division and distinction out of the Platonicks and Peripateticks, I leave to the Reader to judge of. That Mens humana hath no need of any organ, Zench. de Marfilinus Ficinus in his ninth Book of the Soul's immortality, laboureth to prove. Zanch. de Marfilinus doth not differ from Ficinus in words; for (saith he) Ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam, non eget Mens organo; tanquam medicum, per quod intelligat: quanquam eget objecto in quod intuetur, & ex quo intelligentiam concipiat. Hoc autem obiectum sunt phantasmata, seu rerum a sensibus perceptarum similitudo ad phantasiam prolata: To exercise the faculty of understanding, the mind of man (saith he) needeth no instrument, as a mean by which it may understand: but it needeth an object, whereon to look, and whence to conceive the act of understanding. This object are the phantasies, or the resemblances of things received from the sense, and carried to the phantasie. But in effect, his conclusion seemeth to carry a contrary sense, when he maketh the Phantasie, in representing the object to the understanding, to be a corporal Organum; neither can it be understood to be an Organum of any thing, but of the understanding. And he addeth, that the resemblance of things in mans imagination, are to his understanding and mind, as colours are to the sight; whence it followeth, that the imagination or phantasie is itself to the faculty of understanding, as the eye is to the faculty of seeing; and as this is an Organum, so that. Of this question, How the mind in all her actions maketh use of the body, and hath communion with the body, I refer the Reader to a most grave and learned Discourse in the last Reply of M. D. Bislon, late Bishop of Winchester, unto Henry Jacob. Howsoever the Truth be determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discourse, nor in respect of the mind it self, by which we live, nor in respect of our souls simply, by which we are immortal, that we are made after the Image of God. But most safely may we remember our selves to God in mente, and in respect of that pure faculty, which is never separate from the contemplation and love of God. Yet this is not all; For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference between the nature and faculties of the Mind or Soul, and between the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the Image of God: whose words are these, Non propter hoc imago Dei est, quia sui meminit Mens, sed quia intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of S. Augustine;) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere, ac diligere cum a quo facta est, (that is) The Mind (or Mens) was not therefore the Image of God, because it remembereth, understandeth, and loveth it self; but because it can remember, understand, and love God, who created it. And that this Image may be deformed and made unprofitable, hear Basil; Homo ad Imaginem & Similitudinem Dei factus est. Peccatum vero Imaginis hujus pulchritudinem deformavit, & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentie affectibus immergit: Man was made after the Image and Similitude of God, but Sin hath deformed the beauty of this Image, and made it unprofitable, by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscentie.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortality, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it self, nor in all these joyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and understanding, with the other faculties of the Soul, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Original righteousness, most perfectly infused by God into the Mind and Soul of man in his first Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberality, that we were printed with the seal of Gods Image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which, joyned to the Soul, is a part of the Effential Constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountiful grace of the Lord of all goodness, who breathed life into Earth, and contrived within the Trunk of Dust and Clay, the inimitable hability of his own Piety and Righteousness.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) do those that are powerful retain the Image of God, as according to his Commandments they exercise the Office or Magistracy to which they are called, and sincerely walk in the ways of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men so long retain this Image, as they fear, love, and serve God truly, that is, for the love of God alone, and do not bruise and deface his Seal by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obdurate sins. For the unjust mind cannot be after the Image of God, seeing God is Justice it self; The bloud-thirsty hath it not, for God is Charity and Mercy it self; Falsehood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Satan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soul, together with God: and to be short, there is no likelihood between pure light and black darkness, between beauty and deformity, or between righteousness and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common understanding, have made us capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receive this Image of Gods goodness, which the sensual souls of Beasts cannot perceive; yet were that aptitude natural more inclinable to follow and embrace the false and dure-les pleasures of this Stage-play World, then to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanship of God's Wisdom, and the liberality of his Mercy, formed eyes to our souls, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impurity of our flesh, behold the highest Heavens, and thence bring Knowledge and Object to the Mind and Soul, to contemplate the ever-during Glory, and term-less Joy, prepared for those which retain the Image and Similitude of their Creator, preserving undefiled and unrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of God, is created in Righteousness, and Holiness, as saith S. Paul. Now whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by S. Augustine,

S. Ambrose. Augustine, with whom S. Ambrose joyneth, that by sin, the perfection of the Image is lost, and not the Image itself: both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two ways; for, either it is considered according to natural gifts, and consisteth therein; namely, to have a reasonable and understanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the Image of God is more lost by sin, than the very reasonable or understanding nature, &c. is lost, (or sin doth not abolish and take away these natural gifts:) or, the Image of God is considered, according to supernatural gifts, namely, of divine Grace and heavenly Glory, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the natural Image; and this manner of similitude and Image of God is wholly blotted out, and destroyed by Sin.

§. III.

Of our base and frail Bodies: and that the care thereof should yield to the immortal Soul.

THE external man God formed out of the dust of the Earth, or (according to the signification of the word, Adam) of Adamah, of red Earth, or ex limo terra; out of the slime of the Earth, or a mixed matter of Earth and Water. Non ex qualibet humo, sed ex glaybar adamah (id est) expingulissima & molissima: Not that God made an Image, or Statue of Clay, but out of Clay, Earth, or Dust, God formed and made flesh, blood, and bone, with all parts of man.

That, man was formed of Earth and Dust did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble fear he called unto God, to save Sodom: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speak, I that am but dust and ashes: And, In these Boxes of Clay, whose foundation is in the dust, do our souls inhabit, according to Job. And though our own eyes do every where behold the sudden and restless assaults of Death, and Nature assure us by never-failing experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times upon the Earth have neither certainty nor durability; that our Bodies are but the Anvils of pain and diseases, and our Minds the Hives of unnumbered cares, sorrows, and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted pots, against which Envy and Fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true unhappiness of our condition, and the dark ignorance which covereth the eyes of our understanding, that we onely prize, pamper, and exalt this Vassal and Slave of death, and forget altogether (or onely remember at our cast-away leisure) the imprisoned immortal Soul, which can neither dye with the Reprobate, nor perish with the mortal parts of virtuous men: seeing Gods justice in the one, and his goodness in the other, is exercised for evermore, as the ever-living subjects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that we examine this great account? Never while we have one vanity left us to spend: we plead for Titles, till our breath fail us; dig for Riches, while our strength enableth us; exercise Malice, while we can revenge; and then when time hath beaten from us both youth, pleasure, and health, and that Nature it self hateth the house of old age, we remember with Job, that we must go the way from whence we shall not return, and that our bed is made ready for us in the dark: And then, I say, looking over-late into the bottom of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked up from us all our lives,) we behold therein the fearful Images of our actions past, and withal this terrible Inscription: That God will bring every work into judgment, that man hath done under the Sun.

But what examples have ever moved us? what persuasions reformed us? or what threatnings made us afraid? we behold other mens Tragedies plaid before us, we hear what is promised and threatened: but the World's bright glory hath put out the eyes of our minds, and these betraying lights, (with which we onely see) do neither look up towards term-less joys, nor down towards endless sorrows, till we neither know, nor can look for any thing else at the Worlds hands. Of which excellently Marius Victor:

Nil hostes, nil dira famer, nil denique morbi Egerunt, finimus qui nunc sumus; isque periculis Tentati: nullo meliores reddimur unquam; Sub vitis nullo culpam sine manentes.

Diseases, famine, enemies, in us no change have wrought, What 'er it we were, we are; still in the same snare caught: No time can our corrupted manners mend; In Vice we dwell, in Sin that hath no end.

But let us not flatter our immortal Souls herein; for to neglect God all our lives, and know that we neglect him; to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him, casting our hopes on the Peace, which we trust to make at parting, is no other than a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) even a contemptuous laughing to scorn, and deriding of God, his Laws and Precepts. Frustra sperant qui sic de miseri-cordia cordia Dei sibi blandiuntur; They hope in vain, faith Bernard, which in this sort flatter themselves with Gods mercy.

§. IV.

Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into man in his creation.

IN this frame and carcass God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a living Soul: (that is) God gave a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, a Soul spiritual and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodily instruments as men use, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortality into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into such as love and fear him. The Spirit of God (saith Elihu in Job) hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life: In qua sententia (saith Rabanus) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis delimo formasse corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labris suis inspirasse in faciem formati, ut vivere possit & spiraculum vite habere: Nam & Propheta cum ait, Manus tue fecerunt me, &c. tropica hac locutione magis quam propria, (id est, juxta consuetudinem, quae solent homines operari) loquutus est: In which sentence (saith he) the beggariness of carnal sense is to be avoided, lest perhaps we should think, either that God with bodily hands made man: body of slime, or breathed with jaws, or lips upon his face (being formed) that he might live, and have the Spirit of life: for the Prophet also when he saith, Thy hands have made me, speak this Tropically, rather then properly (that is) according to the custom which men use in working. Quantum est periculi his, qui Scripturas sensu corporeo legunt? In what danger are they that read the Scriptures in a carnal sense? By this breath was infused into man, both life and soul; and therefore this (Soul) the Philosophers call

Animam, quae vivificat corpus, & animat; Which doth animate and give life to the body. The inspiration of the Almighty giveth understanding, saith Job; and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soul of man, returneth again to God that gave it, as the body returneth unto the earth, out of which it was taken; according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall return to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the Spirit shall return to God that gave it. Neither is this word (Spirit) usually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, then for the soul; as when Stephen cried unto God: Domine, suscipe spiritum meum; Lord Jesus receive my spirit: and in S. John, And Jesus bowed his head and gave up the Ghost, or Spirit; (which was) that his life and soul left his body dead. And that the immortal soul of man differeth from the souls of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing, and let the earth bring forth the living thing according to his kind, the beast of the Earth, &c. But of man it is written, Let us make man in our own Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Gen. 1. 20. 24. 26. 2. 7. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence received life; so that they again be dissolved into the same first matter, whence they were taken; but the life of breath everlasting, which God breathed into Man, shall, according to Ecclesiastes, return again to God that gave it.

§. V.

That man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortality.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or model, or brief Story in the Universal: in whom God concluded the Creation, and work of the World, and whom he made the last, and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endowed with a divine understanding, by which he might contemplate, and serve his Creator, after whose Image he was formed, and endured with the powers and faculties of Reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might govern and rule the World, and all other Gods Creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of living natures, (to wit) Angelical, Rational, and Brutal; giving to Angels an intellectual, and to Beasts a sensual nature, he vouchsafed unto Man, both the intellectual of Angels, the sensitive of Beasts, and the proper rational belonging unto man: and therefore (saith Gregory Nazianzen) Homo est utriusque naturae vinculum, Man is the bond and chain which tieth together both Natures: and because in the little frame of man's body there is a representation of the Universal, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little World. Deus igitur hominem factum, velut alterum quendam mundum in brevi magnam, atque exiguam totum, in terris statuit: God therefore placed in the Earth the man whom he had made, as it were another World; the great and large World in the small and little World: for out of the Earth and Dust, was formed the flesh of man, and therefore heavy and lumpish: the bones bones of his body we may compare to the hard Rocks and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; of which Ovid:

Ovid. Met. l. 1. Inde genus durum sumus, experientique laborum, Et documenta damnis quæ sumus origine nati:

From thence our Kind hard-hearted is, enduring pain and care, Approving, that our bodies of a stony nature are.

His blood, which dispereth it self by the branches of veins through all the body, may be resembled to those waters, which are carried by Brooks and Rivers over all the earth; his breath to the Air, his natural heat to the inclosed warmth which the Earth hath in it self, which, stirred up by the heat of the Sun, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radical Moisture, Oyl, or Balsamum (whereon the natural heat feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertility of the Earth; the hairs of mans body, which adorn, or overshadow it, to the grafs, which covereth the upper face and skin of the Earth; our generative power to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandering, and unstable clouds; carried every where with uncertain winds; our eyes to the light of the Sun and Moon; and the beauty of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Sun's heat, dry up and wither away; or the fierce puffs of wind blow them from the stalks; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure understanding (formerly called Movis, and that which always looketh upwards) to those intellectual Natures, which are always present with God; and lastly, our immortal souls (while they are righteous) are by God himself beautified with the title of his own Image and Similitude. And although, in respect of God, there is no man just, or good, or righteous (for, In Angelis deprehensa est iniquitas, Behold, He found folly in his Angels, saith Job); yet, with such a kind of difference, as there is between the substance and the shadow, there may be found a goodness in men: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called Man, the Image and Similitude of his own Righteousness. In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the Universal (man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the four Complexions resemble the four Elements, and the seven Ages of man the seven Planets; Whereof, our infant is compared to the Moon, in which we seem onely to live and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercurie, wherein we are taught and instructed; our third Age to Venus, the days of Love, Desire, and Vanity; the fourth to the Sun, the strong, flourishing, and beautifull age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which we seek honour and victory, and in which our thoughts travel to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Jupiter, in which we begin to take account of our times, judge of our selves, and grow to the perfection of our understanding; the last and seventh, to Saturn, wherein our days are sad, and over-cast, and in which we find by dear and lamentable experience, and by the loss which can never be repaired, that of all our vain passions and affections past, the sorrow onely abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more we are accompanied with plenty, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made unsociable to others, we become a burthen to our selves: being of no other use, then to hold the riches we have from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and never before, prepare for our eternal habitation, which we pass on unto with many sighs, groans, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of death, finish the sorrowfull business of a wretched life; towards which we always travel both sleeping and waking: neither have those beloved companions of honour and riches any power at all to hold us any one day, by the glorious promise of entertainments; but by what crooked path soever we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death, whose doors lie open at all hours, and to all persons. For this Tide of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, ever runneth with a perpetual Ebb and falling Stream, but never floweth again: our Leaf once fallen, springeth no more; neither doth the Sun or the Summer adorn us again, with the garments of new Leaves and Flowers.

God set before him, a mortal and immortal Life, a nature celestial and terrene, and (indeed) God gave man to himself, to be his own Guide, his own Workman, and his own Painter, that he might frame or describe unto himself what he pleased; and make election of his own form. Gen. 1. 26. God made man in the beginning (saith Siracides) and left him in the hands of his own counsel. Such was the liberality of God, and man's felicity: whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonless, brought with them into the World (saith Lucilius), and that even when they first fell from the bodies of their Dams, the Nature, which they could not change; and the supernal Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soon after, of that condition, in which they remain in perpetual eternity. But (as aforesaid) God gave unto man all kind of Seeds and Grafts of life (to wit) the vegetative life of Plants, the sensual of Beasts, the rational of Man, and the intellectual of Angels; whereof which soever he took pleasure to plant and cultivate, the same should surely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his own choice and plantation. This freedom of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was anigmatically described by Aesclepius Atheniensis (saith Astruculus) in the person and Fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagoreans, and ancient Poets, wherein it was shewed, that men were transformed into divers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from Reason to Brutality, from Virtue to Vice, from Meekness to Cruelty, and from Justice to Oppression. For by the lively Image of other creatures did those Antients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortal men; as by Serpents were signified Deceivers; by Lyons, Oppressors, and cruel men; by Swine, Men given over to lust and sensuality; by Wolves, ravening, and greedy men; which also S. Matthew resembleth to false Prophets, Math. 7. 15. which come to you in sheeps clothing, but inwardly they are ravening Wolves: by the images of Stones and Stocks, foolish and ignorant Men; by Vipers, ungrateful Men: of which *S. simple purity and from so excellent a cause there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberal choice, purchased by disobedience his own death and mortality; and for the cruelty of mans heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first Age destroyed, but the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those creatures which the Ark contained, reserved by God to replenish the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

Concerning the first Habitation of man, we read, that the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, Gen. 2. 6. Of this seat and place of Paradise, all Ages have held dispute; and the opinions and judgments have been in effect, as divers, among those that have written upon this part of Genesis, as upon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: Some there are, that have conceived the being of the terrestrial Paradise, without all regard of the Worlds Geography, and without any respect of the East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heavens) the way how to find out and judg, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding respective and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation; or, trusting to their own judgments, understood one place for another; and one Error is so fruitful, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousness thereof be not timely restrained. And thirdly, those Writers which gave themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things so observant Sectators of those Masters, whom they admired and believed in, as they thought it safer to condemn their own understanding, then to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnos errores, magnorum virorum autoritate perfusi, transmissimus; We pass over many gross errors, by the authority of great men led and persuaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were far wide from the understanding of this place. I speak it not, that I myself dare presume to censure them; for I reverence both their Learning and their Piety, and yet not bound to follow them any further, then they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should be proud of himself, GOD hath distributed unto men such a proportion of Knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their own weakness: Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus; God never gave the knowledge of all things to any one. Saint Paul confess'd that he knew not, whether he were taken up into the third Heaven in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himself acknowledgeth this much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to S. Jude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi invenitur; But where is wisdom found? and where is the place of understanding? Man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the living. And therefore seeing God found folly in his Angels, mens judgments (which inhabit in houses of Clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and so the Fathers, and other learned men, excusable in particulars, especially in those where upon our salvation depended not.

§. II.

A recital of strange Opinions touching Paradise.

Now touching Paradise, first it is to be enquired, Whether there were a Paradise, or no? or whether Moses description were altogether mystical, and allegorical? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others, have affirmed; and that under the names of those four Rivers Pison, Gohon, Hiddekel, and Perath, the Tree of Life, and the Tree of Knowledge, there were delivered unto us other mysteries and significations; as, that by the four Rivers were meant the four Cardinal Virtues, Justice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence; or (by other) Oyle, Wine, Milk, and and Honey. This Allegorical understanding of Paradise by Origen divulged, was again by Francisus Georgius received (saith Sixtus Senensis); whose frivolous imaginations Sixtus himself doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annotation of his first Book, fol. 338. the last Edition.

S. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegorical construction, and set Paradise in the third Heaven, and in the virtues of the mind, & in negra principali, which is, as I conceive it, in mente, or in our souls: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the Soul or Mind; by Adam, Mens, or Understanding; by Eve, the Sense; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and evil, Sapience; and by the rest of the Trees, the virtues of the mind, or in the mind planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, upon the first of the Corinth. c. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celestial and terrestrial Paradise; the one into which S. Paul was wrapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysostomus is of opinion, that a Paradise had been; but that there was not now any mark thereof on the earth: the same being not only defaced, but withall the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Manichees also understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion, Vadianus inclineth, as I conceive his words, in two several places. First, upon this; Fill the earth, Gen. 10. Of which he gives this judgment. Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini universis animantibus, subjicite terram, clarissime docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (ut tum erat) fructibus constam, sedem & hortum illius Adæ, & posteritatis sue fuisse; These words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule over every creature, do clearly shew, that the Universal earth, set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was,) was the garden and seat of Adam, and of his future posterity. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts, Cap. 17. Apostolus ex uno sanguine omne genus humanum idem sacrum docet, ut habitarent super universam faciem terre: tota igitur terra Paradisi ille erat; The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell over all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith he) was that Paradise. Which conjectures I will answer in order. Goropius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledged that Adam was first planted by God in one certain place, and peculiar Garden; which place Goropius findeth near the River of Aescyres, in the Confines of India.

Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus make Paradise under the Equinoctial; and Ptolemy, quite contrary, under the North-pole: the Chaldeans also, for the most part, and all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament only, or else would have it seated out of this sensible world, or raised into some high and remote Region of the Air. Strabus, and Rabanus, were both sick of this vanity, with Origen, and Philo: so was our venerable Bede, and Peter Comestor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins says of Philo Judæus, that he wondered, Quo malo genio affatus, Eymhat evil Angel he was blown up into this error; so can I but greatly marvel at the learned men, who so grossly and blindly wandred; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, do so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the Kingdoms and Provinces bordering it, by the Rivers which watered it, and by the points of the Compass upon which it lay, in respect of Judea, or Canaan.

Noviomagus also upon Bede, De natura rerum, believeth that all the Earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole Earth (saith he) hath the same beauty ascribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that Fountain from whence the four Rivers, Pison, Gohon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning; for he could not think it possible, that these Rivers, of Ganger, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ran through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one Fountain, yvere it not out of the Fountain of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true local Paradise Eastward, in the Country of Eden.

TO the first therefore, that such a place there was upon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made: and howsoever the vulgar translation, called Jerome's translation, hath converted this place thus, Plantaverit Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis a principio, The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: it is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For, What sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a Garden in Pleasure, or, that a River went out of pleasure to water the Garden? But the Seventy Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, The Paradise of Eden; and so doth the Chaldean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a Place, and for a Noun appellative; which Region, in respect of the fertility of the Soil, of the many beautiful Rivers and goodly Woods, and that the Trees (as in the Indies, do always keep their leaves, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, Pleasantsness, or delicacy; as the Spaniards call the Country, opposite to the Isle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, That as Florida was a Country, so called for the flourishing beauty thereof; so was Eden a Region, called Pleasure, or Delicacy, for its pleasure or delicacy: and as Florida signifieth Flourishing; so Eden signifieth Pleasure: and yet both are the proper names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region (called Pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choise seat of all that Region, Paradise was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of Pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrary to the translation of the Seventy; to the ancient Greek Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Gregory; and to the Rabines, as Ramban, Rabbi Solomon, R. Abraham, and Chmichi; and of the Latines, Severinus, Damascenus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ab initio; for Damascenus's own words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter constructus; Paradisi est a place marvellously planted by the hands of God in Eden, toward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilielmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of latter times, do both understand these words of Eden and of the East, contrary to the vulgar Translation; Parisiensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their own words: After this I will begin to speak of Paradise terrestrial, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Post hæc incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantasse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem &c. And then Senensis; Moses enim clarissime prodit, Paradisum à Deo constitum in regione

*terre Orientalis, quæ dicitur Heden: Heden autem esse proprium nomen, apparet ex quarto capite Gen. ubi legitur, Cham habitasse ad Orientalem plagam Heden; For Moses (saith he) doth shew most clearly, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Country, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we read, that Cham dwelt on the East border of Heden. Pervinus endeavourth to qualifie this Translation; for this particle (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the times of the Creation, and not to the very first day; alledging this place of Christ, that although the Devil was said to be a Man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I think (referring my self to better judgment) the Devil was from the instant of his fall a Man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till mans Creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierom (if that be his translation) adviseth himself better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, converting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (a principio) as, *God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden; Collocavit Deus ante Paradisum volupatis, cherubin; and Pervinus himself acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew, Posuit à parte Orientali horti Heden, Cherubin; He set on the East-side of the Garden of Heden, a Cherubin. Beccanus affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the Text beareth this sense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Beccanus followeth this construction, onely to the end to find Paradise upon the River of Afferces; for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he suppoeth to be the Tree of knowledge of good and evil, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-Tree: which Conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custom of praying toward the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sun riseth in March, which is directly over Paradise (saith Damascenus:) affirming, that we always pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the Temple of Solomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned themselves in their service and divine ceremonies, always towards the West, thereby to avoid the superstition of the Egyptians and Chaldeans.

But

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Judea, yet it was West from Persia) and the serving of God is every where in the world; the matter is not great, which way we turn our faces, so our hearts stand right, other then this, that we who dwell West from Paradise, and pray turning our selves towards the East, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adams fall we have lost the Paradise on earth; so by Christs death and passion we may be made partakers of the Paradise celestial, and the Kingdom of Heaven. To conclude, I conceive, that there was no other mystery in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, then to shew, that the Region of Eden, in which Paradise was, lay Eastward from Judea and Canaan: for the Scriptures always called the people of those Nations, the Sons of the East which inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldeas, and Persia: of which Ovid.

Enus ad Auroram, Nabataeq; regna recessit, Persidaque, & radiis juga subdita matutinis.

The East wind with Aurora hath a bidding Amongst the Arabian and the Persian Hills, Whom Phœbus first salutes at his first rising.

And if it be objected, that Jeremy the Prophet, threatening the destruction of Jerusalem, doth often make mention of Northern Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those Nations that followed Nabuchodonosor, and of whom the greatest part of his Army was compounded; not that Babylon it self stood North from Jerusalem, though inclining from the East towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Peter Comestor giveth best satisfaction: for he useth the word From the beginning, that is, from the first part of the World, (a principio) id est, (saith he) a prima orbis parte; and afterward he affirmeth, that a principio, and ad Orientem, have the same signification: From the beginning and Eastward is all one; a principio idem est quod ad Orientem.

But to return to the proof of this place, and that this story of Mankind was not Allegorical, it followeth in the Text of the 2. Chap. and 9. Verse, in these words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every Tree pleasant to the sight, and good for meat, &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam else where as in the World at large, and then put him into the Garden: and the end why, is expres'd: that he might dress it and keep it; Paradise being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withal) good for meat: which proveth that Paradise was a terrestrial Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plain, and to take away all opinion of Allegorical construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a River; expressing also the Region, out of which this River sprang, which he calleth Heden; and that Heden is also a Country neer unto Chaboran in Mesopotamia, Ezekiel witnesseth.

But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truth and Story of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these words; Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est etiam fons; si non est fons, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates; non est fons, non folia, non comedit Eva de arbore, non est Adam, non sunt homines, sed veritas jam fabula est, & omnia ad Allegorias revocantur. If Paradise be not sensible, then there was no fountain, and then no river; if no river, then no such four heads or branches, and then not any such river, as Pison, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates; no such fig-tree, or fruit, or leaves; Eve then did not eat of the fruit, neither was there any Adam, or any man, the truth was but a fable, and all things else were called back into Allegories. Words to the same effect hath S. Hierome upon Daniel: Contingant cornu deliramenta, qui umbras & imagines in veritate sequentes, ipsam conantur evertere veritatem, ut Paradisum & flumina, & arbores putent Allegorie Legibus se debere servare: Let the dotage of them be silent, who following shadows and images in the Truth, endeavour to subvert the Truth it self, and think, that they ought to bring Paradise, and the Rivers, and the Trees, under the Rules of Allegory.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Story, is the place made more manifest. For, God gave Adam free liberty to eat of every Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth Verse saith that they were good to eat; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beasts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beasts were neither in the third heaven, nor near the circle of the Moon, nor beasts in imagination: for if all these things were Enigmatical or mystical, the same might also be said of the creation of all things. And Ezekiel, speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings, useth this speech: All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, enjoyed him; which proveth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated, to be terrestrial: for the Pro- phets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple style, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, than in any other place of Scripture; of purpose, to take away all scruple from the incredulity of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecy) to be apt to fabulous inventions; and that if he had not described both the Region and the Rivers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the unbelieving Israelites, and others after them, would have misconstrued this Story of Man-kind. And, is it likely, there would have been so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had been an Utopia? For we find that the Valley, wherein Sodom and Gomorrah stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principal Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their unnatural sin purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land of Egypt toward Zoar: In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proveth plainly, that Paradise it self, exceeded in beauty and fertility, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a seat and soil of far exceeding excellency.

Besides, whence had Homer his invention of Alcinous Gardens, as Justin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. And whence are their praises of the Elizian fields, but out of the Story of Paradise? To which also appertain those Verses of the Golden Age in Ovid:

Adulcebant Zephyri natos sine semine flores.*

The joyfull Spring did ever last,
And Zephyrus did breed
Sweet flowers by his gentle blast,
Without the help of Seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and, after him, Ovid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their Sectators, did greatly enrich their Inventions, by venting the Istian Treasures of Divine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poetical conversions, as if they had been conceived out of their own speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if we find what Region Heden, or Eden was; if we prove the River that ran out of it, and that the same afterwards was divided into four Branches; together with the kingdoms of Hevila, and Cush; and that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Desarts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote; I then conceive that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I do not exclude the Allegorical sense of the Scripture; for as well in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the Story being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith Saint Augustine) *Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententie: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantum (id est) Ecclesiam; tertia eorum, qui utroque modo Paradisum accipiunt; (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will have it altogether corporal: a second of those, which conceive it altogether spiritual, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those, which take it in both senses; which third Opinion, S. Augustine approveth, and of which Suidas giveth this allowable judgment: *Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & huius sanctissimum nomen sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est præditum; (that is) As man was created at one time, both sensible, and intelligible; so was this holy Grove, or Garden, to be taken both ways, and endued with a double form.

§. IV.

Why it should be needfull to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

BUT it may be objected, that it is needless, and a kind of curiosity to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no use. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Story be necessary, then by the place proved, the same is also made more apparent. For if we should conceive that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted up as high as the Moon; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the known World; from whence, Adam was said to wade through the Sea, and thence to have come into Judea, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would give any credit unto it. For what could seem more ridiculous than the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this seat of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pishon should be Ganges, which watereth the East India; and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt; and these two Rivers so far distant, as

Secondly, if the birth and works, and death of our Saviour, were said to have been in some such Countrey, of which no man ever heard tell, and that his Miracles had been performed in the Air, or no place certainly known: I assure my self, that the Christian Religion would have taken but a slender root in the minds of men: for times and places are approved witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should relie, or give place to the judgment of some Writers upon this place of Genesis (though otherwise for their doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour and reverence) I say that there is no Fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would believe that there were a piece of the World so set by it self, and separated, as to hang in the Air under the circle of the Moon? or who so doltish to conceive, that from thence the four Rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tygris, should fall down, and run under all the Ocean, and rise up again in this our habitable world, and in those places where they are now found? Which lest any man think that I enforce, or strain to the worst, these are Peter Comestor's own words, Est autem locus amoenissimus, longo terra & maris tractu à nostra habitabili Zona secretus, adèd elevatus, ut nique ad lunarem globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, severed from our habitable zone, by a long tract of Land and Sea, elevated so, that it reacheth to the globe of the Moon.

And Moses Barcephas upon this place writeth in this manner: *Deinde hoc quoque responsum volumus. Paradisum multis sublimiore positum esse regione, atque hac nostra extet terra, eoque fieri ut illinc per precipitium delabantur fluvii tanto cum impetu, quantum verberis exprimere non possis; eoque impetu impulsus præstige sub Oceani ondo respiciuntur, unde rursus proflant ebulliantque in hoc à nobis culto orbe: which have this sense: Furthermore (saith he) we give this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region far raised above this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to pass, that from thence these Rivers fall down with such a headlong violence, as words cannot express; and with that force so impelled and prest, they are carried under the deep Ocean, and do again rise and boil up in this our habitable World: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephraim, which is this: *Ephraim dicit, Paradisum ambire terram, atque ultra Oceanum ita positum esse, ut totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet Regione, non aliter atque Luna orbis Lunam circigit; (which is) That Paradise doth compass or embrace the whole Earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it environeth the whole Orbe of the Earth on every side, as the Orbe of the Moon doth embrace the Moon. To the end therefore that these ridiculous Explications and Opinions do not bring question unto Truth it self, or make the same subject to doubts or disputes, it is necessary to discover the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdom appointed in the very Navel of this our World, and (as Melandhon saies) in parte Terræ meliore, in the best part thereof; that from thence, as from a Center, the Universal might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better judge of the beginning of Nations, and of the Worlds inhabitation: for near unto this did the Sons of Noah also disperse themselves after the Flood, into all other remote Regions and Countreys. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their own forefathers have come, and out of what Regions and Nations; it cannot be displeasing to understand the place of our first Ancestor, from whence all the streams and branches of Mankind have followed and been deduced. If then it do appear by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be unprofitable, it followeth in order to examine several Opinions before remembered, by the Truth it self; and to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common Reason; and afterward to prove directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightfull Garden.

§. V.

That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

AND first, whereas it is supposed by Ang. Chysemers, that the Flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can find any mark or memory thereof (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the Flood the cause of those high Mountains, which are found on all the Earth over, with many other strange effects: for mine own opinion, I think neither the one, nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the face of Paradise was after the Flood withered, and grown old, in respect of the first beauty (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed;) yet if there had been no sign of any such place, or if the soil and seat had not remained, then would

Gen. 2. 10.

would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 850 years after the Flood, have described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses, would not have made so often mention thereof. And though the very Garden it self were not then to be found, but that the Flood, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Rivers still remain the same Rivers. By two of which (never doubted of) to wit, Tigris, and Euphrates, we are sure to find in what longitude Paradise lay; and learning out one of these Rivers, which afterward doth divide it self into four branches, we are sure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it self. For it is written, that out of Eden went a River to water the Garden, and from thence it was divided, and became into four heads; Now, whether the word in the Latine Translation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it self, or to Paradise; yet the division, and branching of those Rivers, must be in the North, or South side of the very Garden (if the Rivers run as they do, North and South) and therefore these Rivers yet remaining, and Eden manifestly known, there could be no such defacing by the Flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered, as future ages knew it not, so is there no probability that either these Rivers were turned out of their courses, or new Rivers created by the Flood which were not, or that the Flood (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hills, or deep Valleys. For what descent of waters could there be in a Spherical and round body, wherein there is nor high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is either by the strength of wind, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the Ebb or Flood of the Sea. But that there was any wind (whereby the Seas are most enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrary is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a wind to pass upon the Earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that, untill the waters sank, there was any wind at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodness, caused the wind to blow, to drie up the abundant slime and mud of the Earth, and make the Land more firm, and to cleanse the Air of thick vapours, and unwholesome mists: and this we know by experience, that all downright rains do evermore differ the violence of outrageous winds, and beat down, and level the swelling and mountainous billows of the Sea: for any Ebbs and Floods there could be none, when the waters were equal, and of one height over all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bays, or Gulfs to receive a Flood, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round form of the Earth and Waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the Waters rather stood in a quiet calm, than that they moved with any raging or overbearing violence. And for a more direct proof that the Flood made no such destroying alteration, Josephus avoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seen in his days; which pillars were set up above 1426 years before the Flood, counting Seth to be an hundred years old at the erection of them; and Joseph himself to have lived some forty or fifty years after Christ: of whom, although there be no cause to believe all that he wrote, yet that which he avouched of his own time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seen. Now, that such pillars were raised by Seth, all Antiquity hath avowed. It is also written in Berosus (to whom, although I give little credit, yet I cannot condemn him in all) that the City of Enoch, built by Cain about the mountains of Libanus was not defaced by length of time; yea, the ruines thereof, Annius (who commented upon that invented fragment) saith, were to be seen in his days, who lived in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile. And if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent: for, speaking of this City of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: Cujus maxima & ingentis molis fundamenta videntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Civitas Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt: The foundation of which huge mass is now to be seen, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the City of Cain, as both our Strangers and Merchants report. It is also avowed by Pomponius Mela (to whom I give more credit in these things) that the City of Joppa was built before the Flood, over which Cepha was King: whose name, with his brother Phineas, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found graven upon certain Altars of stone. And it is not impossible, that the ruines of this other City, called Enoch by Annius, might be seen, though founded in the first age: but it could not be of the first City of the World, built by Cain; the place rather than the time denying it.

And to prove directly that the Flood was not the cause of mountains, but that there were were mountains from the Creation, it is written, that the waters of the Flood overflowed by fifteen Cubits the highest Mountains. And Masius Damascenus, speaking of the Flood, writeth in this manner: Est supra Arinyadam excellens Mons in Armenia (qui Bavis appellatur) in quo confluxerunt multos, sermo est, Diluvii tempore liberatos. And upon Arinyada there is an high Mountain in Armenia (called Bavis) unto which it is said, that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saved themselves thereon. Now, although it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were saved than eight perions (which Masius doth not avouch, but by report) yet it is a testimony, that such Mountains were before the Flood, which were afterward, and ever since, known by the same names; and on which Mountains it is generally received, that the Ark rested: but untruly, as I shall prove hereafter. And again it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was known before the Flood; on which the Thalmudists report, that any Giants saved themselves also; but, as Annius saith, without all authority, either divine or humane.

Gen. 4. 17.

Gen. 8. 12.

Lastly, it appeareth that the Flood did not so turn upside down the face of the earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this, that when Noah sent out the Dove the second time, she returned with an Olive leaf in her mouth, which she had plucked, and which (until the Trees were discovered) she found not: for otherwise she might have found them floating on the waters, a manifest proof, that the Trees were not torn up by the roots, nor swam upon the waters, for it is written: solum, olive raptum, or deceptum, a leaf plucked, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seen to succeeding Ages, especially unto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation, and unto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discovery.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought: making the Ocean to be the fountain of those four Rivers.

His conceit of Ang. Chylamensis being answered, who onely giveth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noviomagus, Padianus, Geropins, Becanus, and all thole that understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembered, this Universality will appear altogether improper. The places which Padianus alledged, being forth fruit and multiply, Fill the Earth, and jubde it, Rule over every Creature, &c. with this of the Adm. And hath made of one blood all Mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, do no way prove such a generality: for the World was made for man, of which he was Lord and Governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his use. Now, although all men were of one and the same fountain of blood originally; and Adam's Posterity inhabited in process of time over all the face of the Earth: yet it disproveth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dress and cultivate, in which he lived in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had been no other choice, but that Adam had been left to the Universal, Moses would not then have said, Eastward in Eden, seeing the World hath not East nor West but respectively. And to what end had the Angel of God been set to keep the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adam's expulsion, if the Universal had been Paradise? for then must Adam have been chased also out of the World. For if all the Earth were Paradise, that place can receive no better construction than this, That Adam was driven out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should believe with Metrodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to deny, he thinks all one, as to affirm, That in so large a field, as the Universal, there should grow but one Thistle. Noviomagus upon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was impossible for those three Rivers, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (which water three portions of the World so far distant) to rise out of one Fountain, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

And it is true, that those four Rivers, being so understood, there could be no conjecture more probable; but it shall plainly appear, that Pison was falsely taken for Ganges, and Gehon falsely for Nilus, although Ganges be a River by Huaila in India, and Nilus run through Ethiopia. The Seventy write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Noviomagus, Geropins, and Padianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their conjecture far more probable,

Gen. 1. 28.
Adm. 17.
26.

Gen. 2. 8.

Gen. 3. 24.

probable, than that of Ephrem, Cyrillus, and Athanajus. That Paradise was seated far beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Countrey in which he was created, and was buried at Mount Calvary in Hierusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many years after the Flood, yet Adam's shins bones must have contained a thousand fathoms, and much more, if he had forsook the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disprove it.

§. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moon: and of others which make it higher than the Middle Region of the Air.

THirdly, whereas Beda saith, and as the School-men affirm, Paradise to be a Place altogether removed from the knowledge of men, (locus a cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceived, that Paradise was far in the East, but mounted above the Ocean, and all the Earth, and near the Orb of the Moon (which opinion, though the School-men charge Beda withall, yet Pererius lays it off from Beda, upon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus;) and whereas Rupertus, in his Geographic of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but finds it seated next or nearest Heavens, it may seem, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates: but neither of them (as I conceive) well understood; who (undoubtedly) took this place for Heaven it self, into which the Souls of the blessed were carried after death.

TTrue it is, that these Philosophers durst not for fear of the Areopagites (in this and many other divine apprehensions) set down what they believed in plain terms, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death for acknowledging one only powerful God; and therefore did the Devil himself do him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Infinite Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gave this judgment of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to me, that both Tertullian and Engelins conceive, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestial Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightful, and healthfull, upon the top of Mount Atbo (called Acrobonos) which being above all Clouds of Rain, or other inconvenience, the people (by reason of their lo many years) are called Macrobii (that is) Long-lived. A further Argument is used, for proof of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preserved from the violence of the Flood: approved by Isidore, and Peter Lombard: in which place also Tertullian conceived, that the blessed Souls were preserved till the last Judgment; which Irenaeus and Justine Martyr also believed. But this opinion was of all Catholique Divines removed, and in the Florentine Council damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gave this judgment: sicut certum est, Enoch & Eliam, nunc vivere: ita ubi nunc sunt, an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certain that Enoch and Elias do now live; so where they live, in Paradise, or elsewhere, it is uncertain. But Barcephas gives a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the four Rivers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not have had sufficient force to have thrust themselves under the great Ocean, and afterward have forced their passage through the Earth, and have risen again in the distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreams have been answered by divers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing upon this subject; of whose arguments I will repeat these few: (for to use long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be judged a vanity in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Invenier.)

It is first therefore alledged, that such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being set so near the Moon, it had been too near the Sun, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must have been too joynt a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the Air in that Region is so violently removed, and carried about with such swiftness, as nothing in that place can consist or have abiding. Fourthly, because the space between the Earth and the Moon (according to Ptolemy and Alfagamus) is seventeen times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes in a gross account about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must have the compass of the whole Earth for a Basis and foundation. But had it been so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men, seeing it would deprive us of the

the Sun's light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions, Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell near those fairs of waters, are deaf from their infancy, like those that dwell near the Cataduppe, or over-falls of Nilus. But this I hold as feigned. For I have seen in the Indies, far greater water-falls, then those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling near them are not deaf at all. Tostatus (the better to strengthen himself) citeth Basil and Ambrose together: to which Pererius, Sed ego haec apud Basilium & Ambrosium in eorum scriptis, quae nunc extant, nusquam me legere memini; But I do not remember (saith he) that I ever read those things either in Basil or Ambrose.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdom. Their taking up might be into the celestial Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and blood, subject to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith Saint Paul) but all shall be changed; which change in Enoch and Elias, was ealie to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the Flood all perished on the earth, having eight persons; and therefore in the terrestrial Paradise they could not be.

For Tostatus his own opinion, who feared not altogether so high as the rest, but believed that Paradise was raised above the middle Region of the Ayre, and twenty cubits above all Mountains, that the Flood did not therefore reach it (which Scotus and other latter School-men also believed; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to over-whelm it;) this is also contrary to the expresse letter of the Scripture, which directly, and without admitting of any distinction, teacheth us, that the waters over-flowed all the mountains under heaven.

And were it otherwise, then might we aswell give credit to Masius Damascenus, and the Thalmudists, who affirm, that there were of the Gyants that saved themselves on the Mountain Baris, and on Sion. But to help this, Scotus being (as the rest of the School-men are) full of distinction, saith; That the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Jordan; and as the Flood was not natural, so was Paradise saved by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifyeth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not believed, that Paradise was so seated, as Beda and others seem to affirm in words, but by Hyperbole and comparatively, for the delicacy and beauty so resembled.

But this I dare avow of all those School-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better teach all their Followers to shift, then to resolve, by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confess that it is written, that the Mountains of Olympus, Acho, and Atlas, over-reach and surmount all winds and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountain-tops, do not find the albes (remaining of their sacrifices) blown thence, nor thence walk'd off by rains, when they return: yet experience hath relieved us, that these reports are fabulous; and Pliny himself (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) avoweth the contrary. But were it granted, yet the height of these Mountains is far under the supposed place of Paradise; and on these self-Hills the ayre is so thin (saith S. Augustine, whom here in I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to bear up the body of a bird, having therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of ayre to mount her self by.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that set Paradise under the Aequinoctial: and of the pleasant habitation under those Climates.

THose which come neerer unto Reason, find Paradise under the Aequinoctial line, as Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus: judging, that there-under might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soil: but against it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the distemperate heat, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly under the Sun. But this is (non causa pro causa) for although Paradise could not be under the Line, because Eden is far from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tygris, or Ganges under it (Ganges being one of the four rivers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper (being but an old opinion) is found to be very untrue, though for the conjecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that every Country, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropick, and so toward the Aequinoctial, did so much the more exceed in heat; it was therefore a reasonable conjecture, that those Countries which were situated directly under it, were of a distemper uninhabitable; but it seemeth that Tertullian conceived better, and so did Avicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those days it might be thought a fantastical opinion (as all are which go against the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place upon the earth of that nature, beauty, and delight that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed uninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and nearest to the Line it self. For hereof Experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discovered. Indeed, it hath so pleased God to provide for all living creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconveniences which we contemplate a far off, are found by tryal and the witness of mens travails, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vain, or as a fruitless lump to fashion out the rest. For God himself (saith Ely) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we find that these hottest Regions of the world, feared under the Aequinoctial line, or near it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Easternly wind (which the Spaniards call the Brisa) that doth evermore blow strongest in the heart of the day, as the down-right beams of the Sun cannot so much master it, that there is any inconvenience or disemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh, and equal, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for these places which my self have seen, near the Line and under it) I know no other parts of the World of better, or equal temper: Only there are some tracts, which by accident of high Mountains are barr'd from this ayre and fresh wind, and some few sandy parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soils we find also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those Regions have so many goodly Rivers, Mountains, and little Brooks, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees, casting shade; so many sorts of delicate fruits, ever bearing; and at all times beautified with blossom and fruit both green and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughs and branches are never unclothed and left naked, their sap crepeth not under ground into the root, fearing the injury of the frost: neither doth Pomona any time despise her withered husband Fortunus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countries called Terra vitiofe, Vicious Countries: for Nature being liberal to all without labour, necessity imposing no industry or travel, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits than vain thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that, to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion, were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion; and followed a works and (to say the truth) all the School-men were grofs in this particular.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Celestia, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved, out of Esa. 37. and Ezek. 27.

These opinions answered, and the region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary worlds, nor under Torrida Zona; it followeth that now we discover and find out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficulty of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations have often changed names with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembered, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers, as well ancient as modern.

Besides, we find that the Affrians, Babylonians, Medes and Perfians (Cyrus only and a few other excepted) sought to extinguish the Hebrews. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romans despised, once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transform the names of all those principal Places and Cities in the East: And after them, the Turks hath sought (what he could) to extinguish in all things, the antient memory of those people, which he hath subjected and intrahled.

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates and Tygris, the better to find the way which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two Considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Judas; and that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Judas Eastward was Arabia Petraea; but in this Region was Moses himself when he wrote: and the next unto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desart, both which in respect of the infertility could not be Eden; neither have any of the Arabians any such Rivers, as are expressed to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must be Eastward, and and beyond both Arabia Petraea, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it self, and by the fertility, and the rivers only described, we must seek it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbours Nations better described. In the Prophet Isaia find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in these words, (spoken in the person of Senacherib by Rabshakeh: Have the gods of the Nations delivered them, which my Fathers have destroyed, as Golan, and Haran, and Refeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telasar; and in Ezechiel, where he prophesieth against the Tyrrians: They of Haran, and Canech, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Afshur, and Chilmad, were thy Merchants, &c.

But to avoid confusion, we must understand that there were two Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he divideth Syria into three Provinces; wherof the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapollitan: the second part is that Valley called Avenis, otherwise Conuallie, or the tract of Chamath, where Affria is joyned to Arabia the Desart; and where Ptoleme placeth the City of Averia: and the third is known by the name of Domus Edenis, or Celo-Syria, otherwise Vallis cava, or the hollow Valley, because the mountains of Libanus and Anti-Libanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Cele in Greek is Cava in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seek: neither doth this Province lie East from Canaan, but North, and so joyneth unto it, as it could not be unknown to the Hebrews. Yet, because there is a little City therein called Paradise, the Jews believed this Celo-Syria to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beroaldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise, though, to give Beroaldus his right, I conceive that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, saying, That he failed in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether mis-understood two of the four Rivers (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appear hereafter. Now to find out Eden, (which as Moses teacheth us) lay Eastward from the Desarts, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red-Sea; we must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Isaiah and Ezechiel joyneth with it. For (saith Isaiah) Golan, Haran, and Refeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telasar. Also Ezechiel joyneth Haran with Eden, who together with those of Sheba, Afshur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the City of Tyre, which was then (saith Ezechiel) The Mart of the people for many Isles. And it hath ever been the custom, that the Perfians conveyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities upon Euphrates, and Tygris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterrane Sea: as in ancient times to the City of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Issius, now Lajazzo. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the only Mart-town of that part of the World, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities every Country yielded; and having counted the several People and Countreys, he addeth the particular Trade, which each of them exercised: They were thy Merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in rayments of blue silk, and of broyered works, fine Linnen, Coral, and Pearl: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kinds they traded, he hath these words: The Merchants of Sheba, and Raamah were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy Fairs, with the chief of all Spices, and with all pretious Stones, and Gold. Now, these be indeed the riches which Persia and Arabia Felix yield: and because Sheba and Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulf, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gums, and Pearls, as their own Countries yielded: and (withall) having trade with their Neighbors of India, had from them also all sorts of Spices, & plenty of Gold. The better to convey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans, or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tygris, and from the City of Teredon, (built or enlarged by Nebuchodonozor, now called Balsara) thence sent up all these rich Merchandizes by Boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as far as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reached within three days journey of Aleppo, and then over Land they past to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now, the Merchants of Canech, which Ezechiel joyneth with Eden, inhabited far up the River, and received this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which themselves had, and which they received out of Perfia, which bordered them. Saint Hierome understandeth by Canech, Selencia, which is seated upon Euphrates, Euphrates, where it breaketh into four heads; and which took that name from Selencus, who made thereof a magnificent City. Hierosolymitanus thinks it to be Ctesiphon: but Ctesiphon is seated down low upon Tygris, and Canneh cannot be on that side. I mean, on the East-side of Tygris; for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie placeth the Schenite upon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be fordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaveth to be the bound of Arabia the Desert, and where the River of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desert of Palmirena: for these people of Canneh (afterward Schenite) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves from their own City of Canneh in Shinar, Westward along the banks of Euphrates, as far as the City of Thapsacus, where Ptolemy appointed the Fords of Euphrates: which also agreeeth with the description of the Schenite by Strabo, whose words are these: Mercatoribus ex Syria selecticiam, & Babyloniam emittibus; iter est per Schenitas; The Merchants which travel from Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those that take Canneh for Charran, do much mistake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from Ur in Chaldea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia; not upon Euphrates itself, but upon the River of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) They of Haran and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, After, and Chilmad, were they Merchants. Wherefore Charran, which is sometimes called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the Region of Mesopotamia; or Aranfluviorum, the Greek word (Mesopotamia) importing, a country between Rivers: for Mes in Greek, is medius in Latine, and Potamos, fluvius. And when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the City itself, to which Abraham came from Ur (as afore said.) For Strabo in the description of Arabia, giveth that tract of Land from the borders of Calagryia, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenite, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, and were in ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabit Batanea, and the North part of the Deserts, stretching themselves toward the inhabited solitude of Palmirena, which lieth between Syria, and Arabia the Desert. So as these of Canneh lay in the very highway from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (in different) to Charran, and to Eden:

and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Selencia: for Selencia was antiently called Chalanne. (witness Aprian and fo Rabanus Maurus) calleth it in his Commentaries upon Genesis; the name by time and mixture of Languages being changed from Chalne, or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Cities, standing in Triangle with Selencia, and almost the next unto it (as) Thelbe-Canne, and Mann-Canne, the one a little to the West of Selencia, and the other opposite unto it; where these Rivers of Tygris and Euphrates are ready to joyn. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canne was (being all three within the bound of the Valley Shinar) it is uncertain: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certain seat thereof, that so many other Cities did retain a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it unlikely, that these additions of Thelbe and Man to the word Canne, were but to make difference between the East and the West, or the greater and the less Canne, or between Canne the old and the new: which additions to distinguish Cities by, are ordinary in all the Regions of the World.

Now of the other City joyned with Eden, as Haran, or Charran, S. Hierome on the Judges July speaketh thereof in these words: Cumque reverterentur, pervenerunt ad Charran, quæ est in medio itinere contra Ninevem, undecim die; When they returned, they came to Charran (which is the mid-way against Nineveh) the eleventh day.

This City is by the Martyr Stephen, named Charran (speaking to the High-Priest:) Ye Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: the God of glory appeared to our Father Abraham, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. But the seat of this City is not doubted of: for it is not only remembered in many Scriptures, but withall exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Crausus the Romane, who for his unsatisfiable greediness, was called Gurgus avaritia; & the Gulf of avarice. Whereof Lucan:
Assyrias Latio maculavit sanguine Carras.

With Roman blood the Assyrian Carre he defiled.

But this City Canne, or Chalne, is made manifest by Moses himself, where it is written of Nimrod: And the beginning of his Kingdoms was Babel, & Erech, and Acad, and Chaln, in the Land of Sinar, or Shinar; where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what Cities and People were subject unto Nimrod; all which lay in the

the said Valley of Shinar, or near it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldea, into which also Eden stretcheth itself, Chaldea, Babylonia, Sinar, idem sunt (saith Cowestor.) Three names of one Country: which Region of Babylonia, took name of the Tower Babel; and the Tower of the confusion of Tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proved in the eleventh Chapter of Genesis, in these words: And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Plain Babylon was built (as afore said.)

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrod's greatness, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proveth that Canneh joyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth that those of Eden were also the Merchants which traded with the Tyrians; and Isaiah in the threats of Senacherib against Jerusalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telassar. But before I conclude where Eden it self lieth, it is necessary to describe those other Countreys, which Ezechiel joyneth therewith, in the places before remembered, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: *Moreover the Sons of Ham were Cush, &c. And the Sons of Cush were Seba, and Havila and Sabtah, and Raamah, &c. And the Sons of Raamah were Sheba, &c. and anon after; Cush begat Nimrod: so as Sheba was the grand-child of Cush, and Nimrod the Son of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebab: though some there are that conceive to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and understanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma took that part adjoining to Shinar, toward the Sea side and Persian gulf (called afterwards Raama and Sheba, by the Father and his Sons, which possessed it.) For (saith Ezechiel) the Merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy fairs with the chief of all Spices, and all precious Stones, and Gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Country, which parteth Arabia Deserta from Arabia Felix, and which joyneth to the Sea where Tygris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselves to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Country, Strabo calleth Catabria, where the best Myrrhe and* Frankincense is gathered: which people have an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the East-side of the Persian gulf. By this it appeareth who were the Shebeans, spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to have been the Merchants of Tyre, for Gold, Spices, and precious Stones: of which they had not only plenty of their own, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromatics, and other proper commodities. For, as Strabo reporteth out of Eratosthenes, In Persice ora initio Insula est, in qua multi & preciosi uniones gignantur: in aliis verb, clari & perlucidi lapilli. Eratosthenes (saith strabo) affirmeth, that, In the beginning of the Persian gulf, there is an Island, in which there are many precious Pearls bred: and in other, very clear and shining Stones. Now, the difference between sheba the Son of Raamah, and seba the Son of Cush, is in this, that seba is written with the Hebrew (Sanchez) and sheba with (Schin;) but whatsoever the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthography, their Countreys and Habitations are diverse. For sheba is that which bordereth the Persian Sea, and saba (whence the Queen of Saba) neighboured the Red-Sea; and so that place of the 72 Psalm expounded Reges Arabum & Saba, hath in the Hebrew this sense: Reges Sheba & Saba.

The Shebeans, Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited upon the Out-let of the same River, upon which the Edenites were seated: and so those of Sheba, towards the Sea-coast, and upon it, past up the Country, by Tygris and Euphrates, being joyned in one main stream, and so through the Region of Eden, which Tygris boundeth, thereby the better to convey their merchandise toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charran, and Canneh, border Eden on the West and North-west: so doth sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-east: Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldean Paraphrast; which Country, by the Geographers is called Caramenia, (L) placed by exchange for (R) which change the Hebrews also often use.

Thus much of those Countreys which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chief were the Edenites, inhabiting Telassar: for these Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Telassar lay most convenient, both to receive the Trade from sheba and Arabia, and also to convey it over into Syria, and to Tyris. Now, to make these things the more plain, we must remember, that that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these Monarchies were utterly destroyed.

For it appeareth both in Ezay the 37. and in the second of Kings, by the threats of Rabshake, the while the Army of Affria lay before Jerusalem, that the Cities of Golan, Harar, Refeph, and the Edenites at Telassar, had resisted the Affrians: though by them (in a fort) maltered and recovered. Have the Ezay 37. v. 11. Gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have destroyed as Golan, and Harar, Refeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar? But it appeared manifestly after Senacherib's death, that these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subjection: for Ezar-Haddon held

2 Kings 19. 35. 20. 11. Affria, and Merodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Army of Senacherib, commanded by Rabshake which lay before Jerusalem (Hezekias then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angel of God destroyed: the King of Babel sent to Hezekias, both to congratulate the recovery of his health, and his victory obtained over the Affrians. After which overthrow, Senacherib himself was slain by his own sons in the Temple of his Idols, Ezar-Haddon succeeding him in Affria. To the Babylonian Ambassadors sent by Merodach, Hezekias shewed all his treasures as well proper as consecrate, which invited the Kings of Babylon afterward to undertake their conquest and subversion. So as, the suspicion of war encreasing between Babylon and Affria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Affria, were employed to bear off the incursions of the Affrians; and their Garrison-place was at Telassar; and the very word (Telassar) faith Junius, signifying as much as a Bulwark against the Affrians. This place Hierosolymianus takes for Refeph, others for Selencia; but this Telassar is the same, which Am. Marcellianus in the History of Julian (whom he followed in the enterprise of Perfa) calleth hishlutha in stead of Telassar, who describeth the exceeding strength thereof in his 24. Book: It is feated in an Island of Euphrates upon a steep and unassailable Rock, in so much as the Emperor Julian durst not attempt it; and therefore it was a convenient place for a Garrison against the Affrians, being also a passage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Country adjoining were lodged to defend the same. This place Ptolemy calleth Teridada, having Refeph (which he calleth Refepha) on the left hand; and Canneb, (which he calleth Thelbe-Canna) on the right hand; not far from whence, is also found the City of Mann-Canna, upon Tygris; and all these located together, as Ezay and Ezechiel have forced them. But the understanding of these places is the more difficult, because Affria (which the Chaldeans call Atturia), and Mesopotamia, were so often confounded; the one taken for the other by interchanging of Dominion. Affria & Mesopotamia in Babylonia nomen tranferunt (faith Niger.) Affria and Mesopotamia took the name of Babylonia. Lastly, it appeareth by those adjacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the World Eden is seated, as, by Charran or Harar in Mesopotamia; also by Canneb and Refeph, according to the opinion of Patabler, who in these words translateth this place: Plantaverat autem JEHOPAH Denu hortum in Eden, ab Oriente: The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden Eastward: that is (faith he in his Annotations) Jusserat naci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabia & Mesopotamia; He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Eastern Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

S. X.

Of divers other testimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

ANd for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seems by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia: which Epistles in the year 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, and Andreas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine. By these Epistles (I say) it seems we may have some farther light for the proof of that, which we have said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both, there is mention of the Island of Eden in the River Tygris, or at least, Tygris in both these Epistles is called the River of Eden. This Island, as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles faith, is commonly called Gozoria (as it were, The Island, by an eminency.) It hath (faith he) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doubtless) remain to this day; though in the rest of the Region so called, this name be swallowed up with the fame of those flourishing Kingdoms of Mesopotamia, Affria, Babylonia, and Chaldea. This Island of Eden hath up the River, and not far beyond it, the City of Hafan-Cepha, otherwise Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Mofal or Mofel, from which (as in that which followeth it shall appear out of Masius) it is not above twelve miles distant. Neither is it to trouble us, That Mofal or Mofel, by Marinus Niger is remembered among the Cities highest up Tygris, in these words, Juxta autem Tygri, Civitates sunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, que nunc Mofel dicitur; magis fatis, &c. (that is) By Tygris are these Cities, Dorbeta near unto mount Taurus (which is now called Mofel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mofel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I say) needs not here to trouble us: seeing for this matter, the testimony of Masius, informed by the Christians that dwell there (the Seat of whose Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, avowing that this Mofal (or Mofal) is in the Confines of Mesopotamia and Affria, seated upon Tygris, and in the neighbour-hood of Nineve; and that it is the famous Selencia Partorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Attur in these words: Ex omnibus civitatibus & pagis quae sunt circum Civitatem Mofel (hoc est) Attur, in vicinia Nineve; Of all the Cities and Towns which are about the City of Mofal (that is) Attur in the neighbour-hood of Nineve. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesephon a City thereabout to be called Attur, (which is the same as Attur, after the Dialect of those Nations, which change ss into t.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesephon, (which is not far off Selencia) for Selencia, to be Affur. By this then we may come somewhat near the end of our purpose. For the Isle of Eden, which lieth in the breast of Tygris, is but twelve miles from Mofal, and that ancient City, which Ptolemy and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Nineve, Philostratus, and Simeon Sethi, Mofala, and John Lean, Mofal, others Mofel, (though it be not the same with Mofal) is set but a little higher upon the same River of Tygris, near Mofal: so that we are like to find this Isle of Eden hereabout. For the same Andreas Masius, which placeth it above Mofal, makes it to be below Hafan-Cepha, which is upon the same River of Tygris.

The only difficulty is this, that some perhaps may think, that the words of the Nestorians in both their Epistles, speak not of any Isle in Tygris, called the Isle of Eden, but of an Isle in Tygris, a River of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more improbable. And yet, if this were the meaning here, we have a testimony from the Learned of those parts, that not only Euphrates, but also Tygris was a River of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worn out, though the Region hath been subject to the same change; that all other Kingdoms of the world have been, and hath by conquest and corruption of other Languages, received new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth over Euphrates, was after the Flood called Shinar, and then, of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia; and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Affria, and Armenia, which embraceth both the banks of Tygris between Mount Taurus, and Selencia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient Ethicus maketh mention, (not that latter Ethicus, Disciple of Callimachus, otherwise by Plutarch and Athenaeus called Isiri, who lived in Egypt in the Reign of Philadelphus; but another of a far higher and remote time) the same being made Latine out of the Greek by Saint Hierom. And though by corruption of the antique Cople it be written, in Ethicus, Adonis for Edenis; yet Adonis being a River of Phoenicia, cannot be understood to be the Region named by Ethicus. For Ethicus makes it a Country, and not a River, and joyneth it with Mesopotamia and Ethiopia, calling the land of Chus Ethiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septrugant. And lastly, the River which watereth the Regions (faith Ethicus) falleth into the Gulf of Perfa: which River he called Armodius for Tygris; Tygris being but a name imposed for the swiftness thereof. And out of Armenia, both Tygris and Euphrates have their original: for out of Eden came a River, or Rivers, to water the Garden, both which Rivers (to wit) Tygris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them traverse Mesopotamia, Regions first of all known by the name of Eden, for their beauty and fertility. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia; and the excellent fertility thereof in divers places is not unworthy the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (faith Strabo) the leaves are always green, and therefore therein a perpetual Spring. Also Stephanus de Urbibus, mentioneth the City of Adana upon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in use in Amor's time, though he spake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Calo-Syria. But to the end I may not burthen the Readers patience with too long a Discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tygris (once joyned together, and afterward separate) are two of those four heads, into which these Rivers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise, were divided: whose courses being known, Eden (out of which they are said to come) cannot be unknown. Now that Hiddekel and Perath, were Tygris and Euphrates, ter, it is agreed by all: for the Seventy and all others convert Persia by Enphrates: & Hiddekel, Tygrum omnes exponunt; And all men understand Hiddekel by Tygris (saith Vatablus.) And because that which I have said of the Isle of Eden shall not be subject to the censure of self-invention, I have here-under set down the words out of the two general Epistles of the Nestorians, as Masius (ad verbum) hath converted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope, were, That the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Affrya, Persia, Babylonia, and have to this day (at least in Queen Mary's time they had) fifteen Churches in one City called Selencia Parthorum, or Mosul upon the River of Tygris; having no sufficient authority to choose themselves a Patriarch (which cannot be done without four or three Metropolitan Bishops at the least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the year of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtain allowance, unto such an Election, as themselves had made: having three hundred year before that, upon the like defect, sent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made known to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for, upon the death of their Patriarch (who of a covetous desire to enrich himself, had forbore to institute Metropolitan Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselves together to consult of the Church-government: And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred years had been of one House and Family to the prejudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stock and Kindred, who aspired to the same dignity which his Predecessors had held; the rest of the professors refused to allow him. Upon which occasion, and for the choice of a Governour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselves. The words of the general Epistle to the Pope are these, about the middle of the said Epistle: Verum nos non acceptavimus, neque proclamavimus ipsum; sed subito convenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Civitatibus & Pagis que sunt circum civitatem Mosel (hoc est, Attur in vicini ad Nineve, ex Babylonia, ex Charræ, ex Arbela, ex Insula que est in medio Tygris, fluminis Eden, &c. i.e. But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him; but suddenly we assembled our selves out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbouring upon Nineve; and out of Babylon, Carra, Arbela; and out of the Island which lyeth in the middle of Tygris, a River of Eden, or rather out of the Isle of Eden, which lyeth in the River Tygris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they used these words: Nosque ipsi apud nos Metropolitanum, quorum est ordinare Catholicum soli panem Episcopum, Episcopum Arbela, Episcopum Salungis, Episcopum Adurbegansen & vestigio convenimus in Insulam, que est intra Tygrum flumen, Eden, secundum compendium inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among us any Metropolitan Bishops, to whom it belongs to ordain a Patriarch, but only a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salungis, and the Bishop of Adurbegansen; but lo, we assembled speedily in the Island of Eden, which is in Tygris, and agreed between our selves, &c.

Now this Island of Eden, Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceived, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (saith he) the better understood. And after he hath distinguished the four sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which he calleth Nestorian, Jacobites, Margites, and Coptis, he goeth on in these words: *Atrox, audita istius mortis, concurrisse ad eam tumultuarius in illam quam modo dixi Tygris Insulam, que duodecim circiter passuum milibus supra Mosel positam, decem fere milia passuum suo ambitu continet, muris undique cincta, & a paucis aliis quam Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that Island of Tygris or Eden before spoken of, which Island is situated about twelve miles above Mosel, containing very near ten miles in compass, and every where incircled with a wall, inhabited by few other men then Christians. And afterward, he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest he addeth the Isle of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tygris; sive Geserta. Furthermore, describing the City of Hosan-Cepha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra predictam Tygris Insulam, rupi aspera impositam; Above the afore-said Island of Tygris, being seated on a steep Rock. Of this Island of Geserta, Andrew Thevet maketh mention in his tenth Book of his general Cosmography, in these words: Geserta on Gesire est au milieu de la Riviere du Tygre, & pense que c'est une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie. Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tygris, the soyle the most fertile of all Asia.*

By this we see that the antique name of Eden liveth; and of that Eden which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petrea, and the Desert where Moses wrote; and that Eden which bordereth Garran according to Ezechiel, and that that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and joyned with those Nations of Reseph, Caneh, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrans, and is found at this day in the paring of the two Regions of Affrya, and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garriioned to resist the Affryans, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of. (as above written) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tygris, and looketh on Enphrates, two of the known Rivers of those four, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficulty in the Text, which seemeth to make the four Rivers to rise from one stream.

BUT it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a River went out of Eden, and not Rivers in the plural: which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith he, hath these words: *Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde dividebatur in quatuor capita: Quæ verba melius consentient cum rei narratione, & ejusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur: Et fluvius erat egrediens ex Edene (hoc est) fluvius procedebat ex Edene regione, ad irrigandum pomarium; & inde dividebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a River went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was divided into four heads: Which words (saith Beroaldus) do better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a River was going forth of Eden (that is) Rivers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard; and from thence it was divided, and they became four heads. The Tygrine differs from the Vulgar or Latine; for it converts it thus, Et fluvius egrediebatur de deliciis; And a River went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a River went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightful and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence, was divided, hath reference to the Country of Eden, and not to the Garden it self.*

And for the word (River) for Rivers, it is usual among the Hebrews: for it is written: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herb that seedeth seed, the fruitful Tree, &c. Here the Hebrew useth the Singular for the Plural, Herb and Tree, for Herbs and Trees; and again, We eat of the fruit of the Tree, in stead of (Trees:) And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God; In medio ligni Paradisi; In the middle of the tree of the Garden, for (Trees.) And of this opinion is David Kimchi, and Vatablus, who upon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrews do often put the Singular for the Plural, as illud, for munusquodq; illorum; and he giveth an instance in this question it self, as, A River (for Rivers) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of divers of the Learned, may, not without good reason, be given to the objection, That Moses speaketh but of one River, from which the heads should divide themselves. Howbeit I deny not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the four heads, to be four notable passages into famous Countries. And so we may take the word (River) Verse the tenth for one River, (to wit) Enphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this River (after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to have been) divides it self, and ere long yieldeth four notable passages into several Countries, though not all the way down stream (for this is nowhere in the Text) where it is noted, that following the River downward, there is conveyance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Affrya) were up Tygris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the River of Eden, doth not say, it compasseth or walleth the whole Region of Affrya (as it had used this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth towards Affrya. The first branch Pison, is Nabar-malcha (by interpretation) Baslinus, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tygris under Amamia; whence riseth the name of Past-Tygris, as it were Piso-Tygris. This leadeth to the Land of Avila or Sissiana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nabar-sares or Narragas; for Nabar-ragas: both which names signify flumen derivatum (a River derived), alio Acracamis, quasi Ranous, by reason of the Froggie Fens which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seat of Chus, about the borders of Chaldea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldea. The third branch Hiddekel, may be expounded the upper stream of Pison, or Baslinus, which runneth into Hiddekel, properly so called (that is, into Tygris) above Selencia, where it sheweth a passage up Tygris into Affrya; where, because at length it is called Hiddekel for Tygris, having before no known proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, so called per excellentiam, being the body of the River Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Otrix. But be it a River or Rivers, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tygris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradise was not far from these Rivers: for that Perath in Moses is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeed) as plain it is that Hiddekel is Tygris. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moses) Eastward towards Assur, as we find, that Tygris is the River of Assyria, propriè dicta, whose chief City was Nineveh, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylon, Nimrod went into Assur, and builded Nineveh, which was the chief City of Assyria.

And as for the kind of speech here used in the Text, speaking of four heads; though the heads of Rivers be (properly) their Fountains, yet here are they to be understood, to be spoken of the beginning of their division from the first stream. Caput aquæ (saith Vlpianus) illud est, unde aqua nascitur; si ex fonte nascatur, fons; si ex flumine, vel ex lacu, prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fountain, then is the Fountain taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a main River any branch be separate and divided, then where that branch doth first bound it self with new banks, there is that part of the River, where the branch forsaketh the main stream, called the head of the River.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertility and happiness of the Babylonian soyl, as it is certain that Eden was such.

IT may also be demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by us described, be of such fertility and beauty, as Eden the seat of Paradise was: which, if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertility and pleasure, that it had before the Curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the Earth, nor the same virtue to any Plant thereon growing, that they had before the Flood; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Country, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I find written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witness, and speaketh of the very place it self; for the Isle of Eden is but twelve miles, or thereabout, from Nineveh, and so from Mosal. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tygrim, alterum flumen, iuxta quod Urbs Dini sita erat. Hæc Regio, omnium quas nos addimus, optima est; &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tygris, not far from the place where Ninus is seated. This Region, of all that we have seen, is most excellent: and he addeth afterward; Cerealis autem fructum procreando adeo ferax est, ut nunquam non feri decemta redat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitful in bringing forth Corn, that it yieldeth two hundred fold. The leaves of Wheat and Barley, being almost four fingers broad. As for the height of Millet and Sesame, they are even in length like unto Trees; which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speak hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seem very incredible to those, which never were in the Countrey of Babylon. They have commonly in all the Countrey Palm-Trees growing of their own accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meats and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Fig-Trees. Thus far Herodotus.

To this Palm-Tree, so much admired in the East-India, Strabo and Niger add a fourth excellency, which is, that it yieldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; Of which these people make Bread, Wine, Honey, and Vinegar. But Antoninus the Eremita findeth a fifth commodity, not inferior to any of those four, which is, that from this self-same Tree, there is drawn a kind of fine Flax, of which people make their garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their Ships. And that this is true, Albanus in the life of Antoninus the Eremita, confesseth, saying: That he received a garment made thereof from the Eremita himself, which he brought with him out this Region. So therefore those Trees which the East Indies so highly esteem and so much admire (as indeed the Earth yielded no plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this upper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith Strabo) passim per omnem Regionem palme sua sponte nascentes; There are of Palms over all the whole Region, growing of their own accord. Of this place, Quintus Curtius maketh this report: Euntibus à parte lava Arabia (colorum fertilitate nobilis) regio campestris interit inter Tygrim & Euphratem jacens, tam ubere & pingui solo, ut à passim repelli pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat; (that is) As you travel on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plenty of sweet Odours) there lieth a Champain Countrey placed between Tygris and Euphrates, of so fruitful and fat a soil, that they are said to drive their their Cattel from pasture, lest they should perish by satiety. Etsi in anno segetes Babylonii fecant; The Babylonians cut their Corn twice a year (saith Niger). And as Countreys generally are more fruitful to the Southward, than in the Northern parts: so we may judge the excellency of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South parts of America, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof. His words be these in the Latine: Tota enim hæc regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemque semper virentibus; This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, and Trees always green: which witnesseth a perpetual Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies onely, by reason of the Sun's neighbourhood, the life and stirrer up of Nature in a perpetual activity. In brief, so great is the fertility of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow down their Corn-fields, and a third time to eat them up with Sheep: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first forty years, could not make our kind of Wheat bear seed, but it grew up as high as the Trees, and was fruitless. Besides, those fields are altogether without weeds (saith Pliny) who addeth this singularity to that soil, That the second year, the very stubble (or rather falling down of the seeds again) yieldeth them a harvest of Corn without any further labour: his words are these, Uberratis tantæ sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restitubis fiat seget.

§. XIII.

Of the River Pison, and the Land of Havilah.

AFTER the discovery of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertility thereof, it resteth to prove that Pison and Gebon are branches of Tygris and Euphrates: For, that the knowledge and certainty of these two Rivers should trouble so many wise men, it is strange to me; seeing necessity it self (Tygris and Euphrates being known) findeth them out: for Euphrates, or Tygris, or both, be that River or Rivers of Eden, which water Paradise; which River or Rivers, Moses witnesseth afterward divided into four heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gebon, &c. Could there be a stranger fancy in the world, than when we find both these (namely) Tygris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seek the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two Rivers as far distant as any of fame known or discovered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plain, that these Rivers were divided into four branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason, and Experience bearing witness. There is no error which hath not some slipperiness and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability, resembling truth, which when men (who study to be singular) find out (straining Reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention and jangling; not doubting, but in the variable deformity of mens minds, to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their help to nurse and cherish such weak Babes, as their own inventions have begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the River of Pison) seemeth to have grown out of the not-distinguishing of that Region in India, called Havilah, from Havilah which adjoyneth to Babylon, afterward known by the name of Sylvania. For Havilah upon Tygris, took name from Havilah the Son of Cush; and Havilah in India, from Havilah the Son of Joban; the one remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise, the other where Moses setteth down the generations of Noah, and his Sons after the Flood. For the Sons of Cush were Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, and Ramah, and the Sons of Joban were Ophir, and Havilah, &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Havilah the Sons of Joban, that Island of Ophir, (whence Solomon had Gold) and Havilah adjoyning, had their names. Now, because Ganges is a great and a famous River of the East India, and Havilah a Country of the same, and is situated upon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pison, which River is said by Moses, to water the Land of Havilah. Or perhaps, it was supposed, that those four Rivers named by Moses, must of necessity be four of the greatest in the World; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous River after Tygris and Euphrates) they chose out this River to make one of the four. And yet certainly there is another River, whom in these respects they should rather have chosen than Ganges: for the River Indus on this side India, for beauty, for nearness, and for fertility, giveth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceive, that Ganges can be of the four heads, seeing Indus cometh between it and Tygris? and between Tygris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdoms. And again, further towards the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie between these two proud Rivers

Gen. 10.

Gen. 11.

Rivers of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdom of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the four, because it is removed from Tygris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much less Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little less than forty degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely, whosoever readeth the Story of Alexander, shall find that there is no River in Asia, that can exceed Indus. For Hydaspis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himself, and the greatest part of his Army, and in sailing down that branch of Indus, found it so large and deep, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleet, which was ready to be swallowed up therein: Hydaspis (as aforesaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great as it, having besides this, the Rivers of Cons, of Sinasus, Aefines, Adrie (otherwise Hirotie), Hispalis, and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are swallowed up with all their children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one stream, it crosseth athwart Asia, and then at Cambaisa vitieth the Ocean Sea.

But because Pison, which compasseth Havilah, as also Gehon, which watereth Cush, mult somewhere be joyned with the rest in one body, or at least be found to proceed out of the same Country of Eden, out of which the other two heads do proceed; out of doubt they cannot either the one or the other be Ganges, or Nilus: For Nilus riseth in the uttermost of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterran Sea; and the River Ganges riseth out of the Mountain Imagor, or (as others will have it) Caucasus, which divides the Northern Scythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tygris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, near Georgiana or Iberia, the other is not far off in the same Armenia, by the Georgian Mountains; so as Ganges, who only travellith in her own India, and Nilus through Ethiopia and Egypt, never law the land of Eden, or joyned themselves in one channel, either with themselves, or with either of the others; and therefore could not at any time from thence be separated, or divided into four heads or branches, according to Mofes.

Therefore the River Pison, which inneth Havilah, is the same which by joyning it self with Tygris, was therefore called Pis-Tygris or Piso-Tygris, of Pison and Tygris, which River watereth that Havilah, which Havilah the son of Cush gave name unto, and not Havilah of India, so called of Havilah the Son of Joſtan, who inhabited with his brother Optir in the East. And this Havilah of the Cushites had also Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx stone. This Bdellium is a Tree of the bigness of an Olive, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yieldeth a certain Gum sweet to smell to; but bitter in taste, called also Bdellium. The Hebrews take the Loadstone for Bdellium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Idela in Hebrew signifieth Pearl: so doth Eugubinus; and Hierom calleth it Oleaster: be it what it will, a tree-bearing Gum or Pearl, Havilah or Sufiana hath plenty of both. Now this Country of Sufiana or Havilah, stretcheth it self towards the North as far as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence embraceth all the Tract of Land Southward, as far as the Persian Gulfe, on the East side thereof: from which East side had the Shebans (which traded with the City of Tyre according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of Gold; which Strabo also witnesseth, as was shewed before.

The Greeks had a conceit, that Pison was Sinub, Danubius: the Rabbins take it for Nilus. Aben-Exra (saith Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia, translateth Pison into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the same impossibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Hellaspont, and all Asia the less between it and Tygris. Now Pison, which runneth through Havilah or Sufiana, doth to this day retain some signe of this name; for where it and Tygris embraceth each other under the City of Amamia, there do they agree of a joyned and compounded name, and are called Piso-Tygris. And it is strange unto me, that from so great antiquity there should be found remaining any resembling found of the first name: for Babylon it self, which dwelleth so near these Rivers, is by some writers known by the name of Bandar, as, by Posellus: by Cassaldus, of Balduch: by Barinus, of Bagdada, and of Bouhedor, by Andrew Thevet; and yet all those that have lately seen it, call it Bagdet. To this River of Pison Ptolemy indeed with many others give the name of Babilus or Regius, and Gehon they term Mahabares, and Marsias, and Barafares. So is Euphrates, near the Spring and Fountain, by Strabo and Pliny called Pixirates: by Junius Tuck-perab, out of the Hebrew (that is) The profusion, or coming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the Mountain Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medes and Zaranda: the Hebrews Parath (saith Ar. Montanus;) Pagninus, Perath: Josephus, Phorab; Eusebius, Zosimus; Ammianus, Ammianus, Chalymicus: Gisiliannus and Colinnus, term it Cobar: which Ezekiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Affrians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nahor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The same confusion of names hath Tygris, as Digitla and Digitath, Scilax and Sollax: of the Hebrews it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants, Tegil.

But Mercer upon Ganges conceiveth rightly of these Rivers: for Euphrates and Tygris (saith he) stream into four branches; two of which keep their ancient names, and the other two are called Pison and Gehon. The reason why these two Rivers, joyned in one (below Amamia), lose their names and are called Piso-Tygris, and the memory of Euphrates extinguished, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the channel of Gehon, sinketh into the Lakes of Chaldæa, not far from Ur, the City of Abraham, and fall not entirely into the Persian Sea, as Tygris, accompanied with Pison, doth.

This error, that Pison was Ganges, was first broached by Josephus, (whose fields, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weeds) and other men (who take his authority to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For, Epiphanius, Augustine, and Hierom, take this for current; whereof it followed, that as Pison was transported into the East India to find out Havilah: so was Gehon drawn into Africa to compass Ethiopia. But if Havilah, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a Region, adjoining to Babylon on the one side, and Cush (which is falsely interpreted Ethiopia) fastned to it on the other side, we shall not need then to work wonders (that is) to impose upon men the transportation of Rivers, from one end of the World to the other, which (among other uses) were made to transport men. Now it was in the Vally of shinar, where Cush the Son of Ham first late down with his Sons Shebah, Havilah, Sabbab, Kaamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Havilah, the Son of Cush did that Region take name, which Pison compasseth; and the Land (called Cush) which Gehon watereth, took name of Cush himself. For as the Sons of Joſtan, Opbir, and Havilah, seated themselves as near together as they could in India, so did the Sons of Cush in shinar, or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Havilah, or Chavilah, was first Chusea, of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Sufiana.

did the Israelites and Amalekites possess all the interjacent Countries: for Saul mote the Amalekites from Havilah to Snur: which Snur, the Chaldean Paraphrast converteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the Red-Sea. But this was not meant from Snur upon the Red-Sea, to Havilah in the East India, for Saul was no such Traveller or Conquerour, and therefore Havilah must be found nearer home, where the Sons of Yisrael inhabited, and which Country Saul waisted: for Amalek and the Amalekites possessed that neck of Country, between the Persian Sea, and the Red Sea; Havilah being the extremity of the one, towards the East, and Snur of the other, towards Egypt and the West, leaving that great body of Arabia Felix towards the South, and they spread themselves with the Midianites and Edumeans, from the East-part, or backside of the Holy Land, to the banks of Euphrates, comprising the best part of Arabia Petrea, and Digerta.

§. XIV.

Of the River Gehon, and the Land of Cush, and of the ill translating of Ethiopia for Cush, 2 Chron. 21. 16.

Now as Havilah in the East India drew Pison so far out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Seventy translated Ethiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Ethiopia by the Greeks, whom the Latines followed, Gehon consequently was esteemed for Nilus. But Ethiopians are, as much as black or burnt faces, whose proper Country called Thebaid, lyeth to the Southward of all Egypt. And although there be many other Regions of Ethiopians, and far South in Africa; yet those of Thebaid are those so often remembered in the Egyptian stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Egypt: all which Ethiopians are very near, or else directly under the Equinoctial line, which is very far from that Land inhabited by the Chusites, who are neither black of colour, nor in any sort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this translation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner: There are (saith he) two Ethiopia's, the East, and West: and this division he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chus Ethiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Cush and the land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petrea, and part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to be the East Ethiopia.

Now, if it be granted, that Cush and the Land

the Amidongites hoping that they had been weary, and unable to resist. Again, in the story of Isaac it is written: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech, and the Philistines unto Gerar: and I am sure Abimelech and the Philistines were no Æthiopians. And lastly, Moses himself, where he describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou comest to Gerar: for Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gaza towards the South. But indeed, howsoever Pererius doth, with an honest excuse, save this Translation of Chus for Æthiopia; yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint and Iosephus had altogether mis-undersanding this place. And first, for Hoher's East and West Æthiopia, they are both found elsewhere: For Pliny in his fifth

Book, and eighth Chapter, cieth Homer for an Author of these two Ethiopia's. But the East Ethiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abissines under Prester John; And the West Ethiopia is that which joyneth it self with the River Niger, which we call Senega and Gambra: for thereabouts are these *Ethiopi*ans called Peroff, Daravites, with divers other names, which Pliny numbeth. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Desarts thereof, faith Pliny out of Homer. (Plin. l. c. 8.)

Agrippa and Julia : which Regions indeed (I mean that of Niger; and that of Prester John, and the Troglodites) lie due East and West. But as for Cush, and the Region of the Amalotes, &c. they are extended directly North from that Ethiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now that Josephus was exceeding gross herein, it appeareth by that fiction which he hath of Moses when he served Pharaoh, in the Wars against the *Ethiopi*ans: for in that (to make Cush, Ethiopia) he transporteth Madian by miracle over the Red-Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and setteth it in Ethiopia, as shall be shewed more at large in the Chapter of the World's Plantation. Again, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greek Copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint have converted this place of the Prophet Hieremie: And what hast thou now to do in the way of Egypt, to drink the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Egypti, ut bibas aquam Gehon? To this faith Pererius, professio Hebraice tibi non est vix Gehon, sed Sichor, quæ significat Nigrum & turbidum: Truly (saith Pererius) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor; which signifieth black and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and unanswerable argument; that Chus was ill taken for Ethiopia. Moses married the daughter of Jethro, Prince and Priest of Madian. Exod. 2.
Numb. 10.
whom both the Greek and Latine call a Ma-dianite, and not Ethiopian, as (with Jesephus) the Geneve converts it, though it helps it a little with a marginal Note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Country of Madian, which is that part of Arabia Petraea, bordering the Red-Sea; & for it is written in the second of Exodus, that Moses fled from Pharaoh into the Land of Middian, and sat down by a Well, &c. And again, in the third of Exodus; When Moses kept the Sheep of Jethro, his father-in-law, Priest of Madian. &c. Indeed, these four Nations are every where mixt in the Scriptures, because they

they dwell confuſedly together (to wit) the Madianites, the Iſmaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chifites, which were all, in one general word, Arabians; and in the Scriptures ſometimes called by one of theſe names, and ſometimes by another; as in Gen. 37. v. 25, 27, and 28, that Joſeph was fold to the Iſmaelites; and in the ſame Chapter, v. 26, it is written, that the Madianites fold Joſeph to Potiſaph, Pharaoh's Steward. The Genevians, in a marginal Note (to avoid this confounding of the Nations) ſay, that Mofes wrote according to their opinion, who took the Madianites and Iſmaelites to be all one. But Mofes wrote not after any mans opinion, he wrote the truth; and theſe were all Arabians: and ſo in this very place it appeareth by their Merchandize, which they brought with them, when they bought Joſeph: for their Camels were loaden with Spiceries, and Balm, and Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia Felix: from whence chiefly, and from the Eaſt India, all the World is ſerved with Myrrhe and Frankincenſe; and their Spices they received from the Eaſt ſide of the Arabian Gulf, as aforeſaid. And in the 29 Chapter, it is ſaid: That Potiſaph bought Joſeph of the Iſmaelites, which the Chaldean Paraſiſt in the ſame place calleth Arabians. Now to make this the more manifeſt, it is written, Judg. 6. That when Iſrael had down, then came up the Madianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the Eaſt, and came upon them: they of the Eaſt were Arabians of the Deſart; ſo as where before in the buying of Joſeph, the Madianites and the Iſmaelites were confuſed, here the Madianites and Amalekites are made one Nation. For in the protection of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites only are named, as comprehending both Nations; and in the eighth Chapter, v. 24, theſe Nations are called Iſmaelites, and neither Madianites, nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon deſired that every man would give him the golden Ear-rings, which they had taken after the victory againſt Zeba and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700. ſhekels of Gold, it is written: For they had golden Ear-rings, becauſe they were Iſmaelites. And theſe Iſmaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and ever in action of War. Alanus ejus contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum: His hand (ſaith God, of Iſrael) ſhall be againſt all men, and every mans hand againſt him. Of theſe Iſmaelites come the Mahometan Arabians, though ſome Writers think Mahomet to be of the ſchemite. And theſe Iſmaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Deſerts of ſur and Pharan (ſaith Joſephus) uſe poiſon upon their Arrows, as the Indians

do. Toward the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites: and beyond them towards the Defarts of Arabia, the Amalekites, and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill Translation of Æthiopia for Chus, is, among other places, made most apparent in the second of Chronicles, in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Æthiopians; for Hierom reads it: the Geneva Translation hath its which were beside the Æthiopsians. Now, how far it is off between the Philistines and the Negro's or the Æthiopsians, every man that looketh in a Map may judge. For the Philistines and Arabians do mixe and joyne with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Æthiopia about two and thirty, or three and thirty degrees; and therefore not their next neighbours; but all Egypt, and the Desert of Sur and Pharan are between them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles; should have been translated in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram, the spirits of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine and border upon the Chusites, who indeed are their next neighbours.

Now, may we think, is it probable, or possible, that Moses could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no living man so well, and therefore would never have named Gebon for Nilus, or Nilus for Gebon. Surely, if Moses had meant Nilus, when he named Gebon, he would have called the River (into which he was cast upon Reeds, and preserved by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharaoh) a River of Egypt, wherein he was born and bred, and wrought so many miracles. Besides, the River of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but never by the name of Gebon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had been a River of Paradise, they might justly have thought, that he had decided them: for they had lived there all days of their lives, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof, except we shall believe the Paradise of Hesperides, where (saith Pliny) there was nothing found in his time, but wilde Olives in stead of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichon, once in Isaiah, and once in the Prophet Jeremie; and yet in those places it is not said to be a River of Aethiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had never any communion or affairs with the Ethiopians, nor any intelligence or trade beyond Egypt to the South; but the enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Madianites: who being often governed by many little kings, or Reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers or Heads of those Nations; but in one general name were all Ara- bians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Cale-Syrians, with the Magogians, Inhalites, and others their adherents. And thirdly, within themselves, the Nations which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities upon the Sea-coast, as Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Jerusalem it self was with-held from Israel, from the days of Abel, even unto the time of David, by the Jehusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficulty, is, that it doth not appear that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was, that Adam, Berequidus lost himself in seeking out Paradise: for he was driven (to my understanding) to create two Rivers, and call them Gehon and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Havilah; for I find none such in Natural History, as he hath described: by which Rivers he also includeth within Paradise, even Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proved, that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon, Nilus &c. where to find them elsewhere, it seemeth he knew not. Certainly, this River of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterranean at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth far East in Arabia, is but imaginary; for the Current by Gaza, is but a small stream, rising between it and the Red-Sea, whose head from Canaa it self is little more than twenty English miles, as shall appear hereafter. But questionless, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the stars of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their near neighbours, and never looked back to the first seats and plantation of Chus. For after the Flood, Chus and his children never rested, till they found the Valley of shinar, in which, and near which himself, with his Sons, first inhabited. Havilah took the River-side of Egypt chiefly on the East, which after his own name, he called Havilah, (now Susana): Raamah, and Sheba farther down the River, in the entrance of Arabia-felix. Nimrod seated himself in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himself and his brother Mizraim first kept upon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldaa; and in process of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselves more West-ly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim past over into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many years after. Now, because there could be no such River found in Arabia the stony, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus, Ethiopia; and Gehon, Nilus. And if we do examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceive it as it was. For let us suppose, that Brute, or whosoever else that first peopled this Island, had arrived upon the River of Thames, and called the Island after his name Britannia; it might be said that Thames or Tems was a River that watered Britannia: and when afterwards, in process of time, the same Brute had also discovered and conquered Scotland, which he also entitled by the same name of Britannia, after-ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the River of Tems is not found therein. Or let us suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phoenicia, gave the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discoverers thereof arrived in the mouth of the River in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as he first discovered; Shall we in like sort resolve that France, Spain, and Italy, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that River is not found in them, or any of them? In like manner, was it said by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which the Chusites should, or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit: seeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) have been Masters in time, (as the Saracens, which came of them, were) of a great part of the World. For, though the Babylonian Empire which took beginning in Nimrod the Son of Chus, consisted at the first, but of four Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chaluz; yet we find, that his Successors within a few years after, commanded all the whole World in effect: and the same of Babel consumed the memory of Chus. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatness of that Empire founded by Nimrod a younger Son, obscured the name and Nation of his Father Cush in those parts, until they crept farther off, and in places not yet entitled, and farther ther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fastned to the Soil and Territory, by themselves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not think, that Chus, or any of his, could in half creep through those desert Regions, which the length of 130. years after the Flood had (as it were) fortified with Thickets; and permitted every Bush and Bryar, Reed and Tree, to joyn themselves (as it were) into one main body and Forest. For if we look with judgment and reason into the Worlds Plajitation, we shall find, that every Family seated themselves as near together as possibly they could; and though necessity enforced them, after they grew full of people, to spread themselves, and creep out of Shinar, or Babylonia; yet did they it with this advice, as that they might at all times resort and succour one another by River, the fields being then (without all doubt) impassible. So Nimrod, who out of wit and strength usurped dominion over the rest, sat down in the very confluence of all those Rivers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was, to which the greatest troupes of Noah's children repaired; and from the same place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they again their increace. The first Father of men, Adam, had thier in his former habitation: The second Father of Mankind, Noah, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as Nimrod the youngest, yet strongest, made his choyce of Babel (as afore said) which both Tygris and Euphrates cleansed and enriched; so did Havilah place himself upon Pish-Tygris; Rasuch and his Son Sheba farther down upon the same River, on the Sea coast of Arabia: Chush himself upon Gehon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselves farther off, yet they alwaies fastened themselves to the Rivers sides: for Ninive, Charan, Resph, Cannib, Ur in Chaldea, and the other first-peopled Cities, were all founded upon these navigable Rivers, or their branches; by which the one might give succour and assistance to the other, as is already often remembred.

§. XV.

A conclusion, by way of repetition of something spoken of before.

BUT now to conclude this Dispute, It appeareth to me by the testimonies of the Scripture, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden; afterward called Aram fluviarium, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other (to wit) 35. degrees from the Aequinoctial, and 55. from the North-pole: in which Climate, the most excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyle, Grain of all sorts, are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proveth the excellency of this said soil and temper, then the abundant growing of the Palm-trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein soever the Earth, Nature, and the Sun can most vaunt that they have excelled; yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their works: This Tree alone giveth unto man whatsoever his life beggeth at Nature's hand. And though it may be said, that these Trees are found both in the East and West Indies, which Countries are also blessed with a perpetual Spring and Summer; yet, lay down by those pleasures and benefits, the fearful and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venomous Beasts and Worms, with other inconveniences; and then there will be found no comparison between one and the other.

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradise had, before God (for man's ingratitude and cruelty) cursed the Earth, we cannot judg; but I may safely think, that by how much Adam exceeded all living men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular Garden exceed all parts of the Universal World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees, of Life, and of Knowledge; Plants only proper and becoming the Paradise, and Garden of so grant a Lord.

The sum of all this is; That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture have been dim-lighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our known World: some, above the middle region of the ayr: some, elevated near the Moon: others, as far South as the Line, or as far North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the Reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like Castles in the ayr, and in mens fancies vainly imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (saith Moses) Eastward, in respect of Judea, that God planted this Garden; which Eden we find in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A River went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence divided it self into four branches; and we find that both Tygris and Euphrates swimming through Eden do joyn in one, and afterward taking waies apart, do water Chus and Havilah, according to Moses, the true seats of Chus and his Sons being then in the Valley of shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Rison was Ganges, the Scripture, reason, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was never joyned, cannot be divided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Rivers of Eden; That Gebon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibility; and this River is a greater stranger to Tygris and Euphrates, then Ganges is: for although there are between Tygris and Ganges above four thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountains of the Moon, almost as far off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterrane Sea: and Euphrates distilleth out of the Mountains of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulf of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and travaileth North; the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, threecore and three degrees the one from the other. In this leaf following, I have added a Chorographical description of this terrestrial Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceive the preceding Discourse; and this is the reward I look for, that my labour may but receive an allowance suspended, until such time as this description of mine be reproved by a better.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chief Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

S. I.

That the Tree of Life was a material Tree; and in what sense it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden Fruit, is made subject to death.

FOR eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of Knowledge, was Adam driven out of the Paradise, In exilium vite temporalis, Into the banishment of temporal life, saith Beda. That these Trees of Life and Knowledge were material Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospel) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile as nothing can fix them, and so slippery as nothing can fasten them, have in this also delivered to the World, an imaginary doctrine.

The Tree of Life (say the Hebrews) hath a Plural construction, and is to be understood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of lives, because the fruit thereof had a property, to preserve both the growing, sensitive, and rational life of man; and not only (but for Adam's transgression) had prolonged his own daies, but also given a durable continuance to all his posterity; and that so long, as a body compounded of Elements could last.

And although it is hard to think, that flesh and blood could be immortal, but that it must once perish and rot by the unchanged Law of God imposed on his creatures; Man (notwithstanding) should have enjoyed thereby a long, beautiful, and ungrrieved life: after which (according to the opinion of most Divines) he should have been translated, as Enoch was. And, as before the Flood, the days of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred years; and soon after the Flood, of two hundred years and upwards, even to five hundred; so if Adam had not disobeyed Gods first and easie Commandment, the lives of men on earth might have continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men have conceived. Chrysostom, Rupertus, Zosimus, and others were of belief, that (but for Adams fall and transgression) Adam and his Posterity had been immortal. But such is the infinite Wildom of God, as he foresaw that the earth could not have contained Mankind; or else, that millions of Souls must have been ungenerated, and have had no being, if the first number wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for ever: And therefore that of Chrysostom must be understood of immortality of bodies, which should have been translated and glorified.

But of what kind or species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in in which respect many have conceived, that the same was not material, but a meer Allegorie; taking their strength out of Solomon, where Wildom is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life; as out of the Apocalypse, I will give to him that overcometh, so eat of the Tree of life which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place Saint Augustine's answer may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terrestrial Paradise, so there was a celestial. For although Agar and Sarah were Figures of the Old and New Testaments; yet to think that they were not Women, and the Maid and Wife of Abraham, were meer foolishness. And so in this place, the sense of the Scripture is manifest: For God brought out of the Earth every Tree fair to the sight, and sweet to the taste; the Tree also of Life in the midst of the Garden: which sheweth, that among the Trees, which the Earth by God's commandment produced, the Tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiod, Homer, Ovid, and others, steal the invention of the created World; so from the Garden of Paradise they took the Platform of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Hesperides; and from the Tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, signifieth making young; and Ambrosia, immortality; and therefore said to be the meat and drink of the gods.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

NOW, for the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, some men have presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giveth himself the honor to have found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could ever guess at; whereto Goropius much marvelled. But as he had an inventive brain, so there never lived any man, that believed better thereof, and of himself. Surely, howsoever his opinion may be valued, yet he usurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the invention be at that price at which he setteth it. For Moses Bar-Cephus fastened on this conjecture above six hundred years before Becanus was born: and Bar-Cephus himself referreth the invention to an antiquity more remote, citing for his Authour Philoxenus

Maburgensis, and others, whose very words Goropius useth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith he would induce other men to that belief. For Moses Bar-Cephus in his Treatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 48.) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica, The Indian Fig-Tree; of which the greatest plenty (saith Becanus) are found upon the banks of Acemes, one of the Rivers, which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleet of Gallies, in or near the Kingdom of Porus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bigness of a great Peaze, or (as Pliny reporteth) somewhat bigger; and that it is a Tree, se semper forens, Always planting it self; that it spreadeth it self so far abroad, as that a troop of Horse-men may hide themselves under it. Strabo saith, that it hath branches bending downwards, and leaves no less than a shield. Aristobolus affirmeth, that fifty Horse-men may shadow themselves under one of these Trees. Onciscritus raiseth this number to four hundred. This Tree (saith Theophrastus) exceeded all other in bigness, which also Pliny and Onciscritus confirm: to the trunk of which, these Authours give such a magnitude, as I shame to repeat. But it may be, they all speak by an ill-understood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a Plant as Becanus conceiveth, who, because he found it no where else, would needs draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and set it by the River Acemes. But many parts of the world have them, and I my self have seen twenty thousand of them in one Valley, not far from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner: After they are first shot up some twenty or thirty foot in length (some more, some less, according to the soil) they spread a very large top, having no bough nor twig in the trunk or stem: for from the utmost end of the head-branches, there issueth out a Gummy yuice which hangeth downward like a cord or sinew, and within a few months reacheth the ground; which it no sooner toucheth, but it taketh root, and then being filled both from the top-boughs, and from his own proper root, this cord maketh it self a Tree exceeding hastily. From the utmost boughs of these young Trees, there fall again the like cords, which in one year and less (in that World of a perpetual Spring) become also Trees of the bigness of the neather part of a Lance, and as freight as Art or Nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kind of Grove, as no other Tree in the world can do. Now, one of these Trees considered, with all his young ones, may may (indeed) shroud four hundred or four thousand Horf-men, if they please; for they cover whole Valleys of ground where these Trees grow near the Sea-bank, as they do by thousands in the inner parts of Trinidado. The cords which fall down over the banks into the Sea, shooting away downward to find root under water, are, in those Seas of the Indies where Oysters breed, intangled in their beds, so as by pulling up one of these cords out of the Sea, I have seen five hundred Oysters hanging in a heap thereon; whereof the report came, That Oysters grew on Trees in India. But that they bear any such huge leaves, or any such delicate fruit, I could never find, and yet I have travelled a dozen miles together under them. But to return to Goropius Becanus: This Tree (saith he) was good for meat, and pleasing to the sight, as the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil is described to be.

Secondly, This Tree having so huge a trunk (as the former Authours report, and Becanus believeth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eve hid themselves from the presence of God; for no other Tree (saith he) could contain them. But first it is certain, that this Tree hath no extraordinary magnitude, as touching the trunk or stem: for among ten thousand of them, it is hard to find any one bigger than the rest, and these are all but of a mean size. Secondly, the words of Moses translated, In medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters understood in the plural number (that is) In the midst of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Bar-Cephas) word for word, is, That when Adam and Eve found themselves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaves; which proveth (indeed) that either the Tree it self was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew near it; because Adam being possessed with shame, did not run up and down the Garden to seek out leaves to cover him, but found them in the place it self; and these leaves of all other were most commodious, by reason of their largeness; which Pliny avoweth in these words, Latitudo foliorum peltæ effigiem Amazonie habet; The breadth of the leaves hath the shape of an Amazonian shield: which also Theophrast confirmeth; the form of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Virg. Æn. l. 4. 494. Ducit Amazonidum lunatis agmina peltis Penthesilea furens.

The Amazons with Crescent-formed shield
Penthesilea leads into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to be believed, or rather threatneth us all that read him, to give credit to this his borrowed discovery, using this confident (or rather cholerick) speech: *Quis erit tam impudenter obstinatus, si hæc à nobis, de sicu hac æq. antiquis scriptoribus cum Moisis narratione comparet, ut audeat dicere, Aliam arborem inveniri posse, quæ cum illa magis quadrat? Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things which we have reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers delivered, with the narration of Moses, as to dare to avow, That any other Tree can be found, which doth more properly answer, or agree therewith? But for my self, because I neither find this Tree, sorting in body, in largeness of leaves, nor in fruit to this report; I rather incline to the opinion of Philos. That the Earth never brought forth any of these Trees, neither before nor after. But I leave every man to his own belief, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kind; onely thereby, and by the easie Commandment by God given to Adam, to forbear to feed thereon; it pleased God to make trial of his obedience: *Prohibita non propter aliud quam ad commendandum puræ ac simplicis obedientie bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other respect, than thereby to commend the goodness of pure and simple Obedience.

§. III.

Of Becanus his not-witty allegorizing of the Story of his Ficus Indica.

BUT in this I must do Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it self to be true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I have gathered in these few words. As this Tree (saith he) so did Man grow straight and upright towards God, until such time as he had transgressed and broken the Commandment of his Creatour; and then like unto the boughs of this Tree, he began to bend downward, and stooped toward the Earth, which all the rest of Adam's Posterity after him have done, rooting themselves therein, and fastning themselves to this corrupt world. The exceeding umbragiousness of this Tree, he compareth to the dark and shadowed life of man, through which the Sun of justice being not able to pierce, we have all remained in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climb the Tree of the Cross for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to find among so many large leaves, may be compared (saith he) to the little virtue, and unperceived Knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shadow it over. And as this fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate: so are the delights and pleasures of the World most pleasing, while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed, into choler and bitterness: so are our vanities and pleasures converted into the bitterest sorrows and repentances. That the leaves are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaves) exceeding little; in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shews, and publick ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we seek for the fruit, which ought to be their virtuous and pious actions, we finde it of the bigness of the smallest pease; glory, to all the world apparent: goodness, to all the World invisible. And furthermore, as the leaves, body and boughs of this Tree, by so much exceed all other Plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly ability surpass the meanest: so is the little fruit of such Men, and such Trees, rather sitting and becoming the unworthiest Shrub, and humblest Bryar; or the poorest and basest Man, then such a flourishing stateliness, and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after he had disobeyed God, and beheld his own nakedness and shame, sought for leaves to cover himself withal: this may serve to put us in mind of his and our sins, as often as we put on our garments, to cover and adorn our rotten and mortal bodies: to pamper and maintain which, we use so many uncharitable and cruel practices in this world.

§. IV.

Of the names of the tree of Knowledge of good and evil: with some other notes touching the story of Adam's sin.

NOW, as touching the sense of this Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propertie of the Tree it self, Moses Bar-Cephas, an ancient Syrian Doctor (translated by Mosses) giveth this judgment: That the fruit of this Tree had no such virtue or quality, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if he had been ignorant before; but as Junius also noteth: Arbor scientie boni & mali (id est) experientie boni & mali ab e-ventu. The Tree of Knowledge of good and evil (that is) the experience of good and evil by the event. For thus much we may conceive, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of Gods own hand, in greater perfection than ever any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whose seed all men living have grown up; and having received immortality from the breath or spirit of God; he could not (for these respects) be ignorant, that the disobeying of Gods commandment was the fearfullest Evil, and the observation of his Precepts the happiest Good. But as men in perfect health do (notwithstanding) conceive, that sickness is grievous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering and experience in themselves they afterwards witness: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the proof thereof in himself, another terror than he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glass of his own guilty soul, he beheld therein the horror of Gods judgments; so as he then knew, (he feelingly knew) and had trial of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased evil, which could not be expressed. He then saw himself naked both in body and mind; that is, deprived of Gods grace and former felicity: and therefore was this Tree called the Tree of Knowledge, and not because the fruit thereof had any such operation by any self quality or effect: for the same phrase is used in many places of the Scriptures, and names are given to Signs and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort, as this Tree was called the Tree of Knowledge, because of the event, as is aforesaid: so was the Well of contention therefore called Ephraim; and the Well of hatred Sinnath, because the Heardsmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them: and the heap of Stones called the heap of witness, between Jacob and Laban; nor that the Stones bare witness, but for a memory of the Covenant. So Jacob called the house of God Beithel, and Hagar, the Well in the Desert, Vivientis, & videntis.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affection, ambitious of a farther knowledge than he had perceived in himself, and looking but slightly (as all his issue do) into the miseries and sorrows incident; and greatly affecting the supposed glory which he might obtain by tasting the fruit forbidden: he was transported and blown forward, by the gentle wind of pleasing persuasions, unawares; his progression being strengthened by the subtle arguments of Sathan, who laboured to poison mankind in the very root, which he moistened with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himself perished for ever.

But what means did the Devil find out, or what instruments did his own subtilty present him, as fittest and aptest to work this mischief by? even the unquiet vanity of the Woman; so as by Adams hearkning to the voice of his wife, contrary to the express commandement of the living God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subject of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being given to man for a comfort and companion; but not for a counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voice of thy wife, &c. (said God himself) Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; even by the most ugly and unworthy of all beasts into whom the Devil entered and perwaded.

Secondly, what was the motive of her disobedience? even a desire to know what was most unfitting for her knowledge; an affection which hath ever since remained in all the posterity of her Sex. Thirdly, what was it that moved the man to yield to her persuasions? even the same cause which hath moved all men since to the like consent; namely, an unwillingness to grieve her and make her sad, lest she should pine and be overcome with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Solomon the Son of David, Gods chosen servant, and himself a man endowed with the greatest wisdom, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the persuasion and for the love they bare to a woman, it is not so wonderful as lamentable, that other men in succeeding ages have been allured to so many inconvenient and wicked practices by the persuasions of their wives, or other beloved darlings, who cover over and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeit passion of dissimulate sorrow and unquietness.

CHAP. V.

Of divers memorable things, between the Fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

S. I.

Of the cause and the revenge of Cains sin: and of his going out from God.

THE same Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possessed Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (envious of the acceptance of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) slew him, making himself the first Manslayer, and his Brother the first Martyr: the revenge of which unnatural murder, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cried out that his punishment was greater than he could bear. For the same offence chiefly (wherewith the Sons of Adam, as it were, urged and provoked God) he destroyed all Mankind, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth also was corrupt before God: of which in the same place, Moses giveth a reason: for saith he, The Earth was filled with cruelty: and anon after, God himself made the cause known unto Noah, saying; An end of all flesh is come before me, for the Earth is filled with cruelty through them, and behold, I will destroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither was this cruelty meant to have been in taking away the lives of men only, but in all sorts of Injustice and Oppression. After this Murder of Abel, Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the East-side of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be understood after the literal sense, God being wholly in all parts of the World: Totus in celo est, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, sed utrumque simul; God (saith S. Augustine) is wholly in Heaven, and wholly in Earth, not by changed times, but all at once; And that this is true, David witnesseth: if I be in Heaven (saith David) thou art there; if in Hell, thou art there also. But what is meant thereby? Exiit a facie Dei (saith Chrysostom) Cain went out from the presence of the Lord; (that is) he was left of God, disfavoured and bereaved of his protection.

S. II.

THIS word Nod or Naid, S. Hierom and many others understand to signifie want-wandering, or uncertain habitation: vexation or agitation; saith Junius; but the Seventy convert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Countrey, and so doth Josephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wanderer in his cogitations, than any thing else; and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the Murder committed, justly fearing (by his own words) the like violence: And whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me. Now, that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifieth an Abiding: and we call those people Wanderers and Vagabonds that have no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the earth this his habitation was which he affirmeth towards the East-side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or favour of God, he built a City, and called it by the name of his first-born, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather sought to fortify himself against revenge. Cyrillus saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ, and of the Jews; and that as Cain after that he had slain Abel unjustly, had thenceforth no certain abiding in the World: so the Jews, after they had crucified the Son of God, became Runnagates: and it is true, that the Jews had never since any certain Estate, Common-weal, or Prince of their own upon the Earth. Now, this Land of Nod, Junius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of the Nomades; but Arabia the Desert is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, in what part of the World soever, which in old time lived by Pastorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland) upon white meat, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greeks Nomades, and by the Latines, Pastores vagi, as the Northern Tartarians, the Gextulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Britains, and the Northern Irish: yea, such were the Inhabitants of Italy it self, till such time as Italus (who gave them that name) taught them the husbandry of Tillage, used at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Assyria, called by Ptolemy, Calena; which also might be derived of Carena, the Countrey of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts, it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, Genes. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the Earth whence he was taken: and in the Verse following: Thus he cast out man, &c. and at the East-side of the Garden of Eden beset the Cherbims: which sheweth that the entry into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text. Cain also in the same Region sought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod, or Naid, do signifie profugus, that is, a Fugitive, we can give no longer time to this uncertain habitation of Cain, then till he built the City of Enoch, the first of the World, which he enclosed, either for his own defence, or (as Josephus writeth) to oppress others thereby. So as, for mine own opinion, I am resolved with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (Vagabond) which Cain useth of himself, it seemeth by the perelose of the same Verse, that (Vagabond) is therein understood for such an one as travelleth in fear of revengement: For whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me; or else (Vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the favour of God.

And because these Henochians, so called of the City of Henoch, were the first society and civil assembly of all other, it is likely that the same of these People (either for cruelty, strength, or other actions) lived in memory of Noah and his Sons: so that after the Flood (as there were of all sorts of natures, some virtuously, some impiously disposed, and every active mind setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those People, which delighted in cruelty and oppression, took on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it self, where Henoch stood before the Flood, and whereof Monuments might remain (as the pillars or foundation of Joppe did) gave occasion to the Planters of that place, to call themselves by the same name: for of those Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, and Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, and Bactria; of the same name many mountains, as those which are otherwise call'd Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time hath covered over, or defaced, we may (according to the counsel of Plato) exceedingly rejoyce, and therewith satiate our selves, if of so great, and almost worn-out Antiquity, of the eldest Peoples names and nations, there remain any print or footsteps to Posterity.

In * Pliny, P. Atla, Strabo, Iulianus Flaccus, Theon, Stephanus, we find these Henocher, described, though diversely written: as in Pliny, sometimes Henochii, in Mela, Enochii; in Placens, Henochoi; in Lucan, Eniochi: all which inhabit upon the Sea Excusius, but yet none of these are on the East side of Eden, or (according to Moses words) Eastward from Eden. For Moses, in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precise, as sometimes he useth the word East or South without borrowing or addition; at other times with a borrowing, as Eastward, or Southward, or towards the East or South. In the place of Genesis the eleventh, he writeth the word (East) simply and directly. And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar; but in this Cain, he addeth the word (towards) as, in the land of Nod, towards the East-side of Eden, which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two, either to the North, or to the South of the East.

But, as we may conjecture that these Nations took name of Enoch the City of Cain; or of the Region wherein it stood, when the same was re-peopled after the Flood: so it is probable that these Henochii of Colchis, and other parts adjoining, were not the first of that name after the Sons of Noah began to fill the World again: because, had this Henoch the City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then been seated North, and not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Pliny findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards he goeth on Eastward, till he track them or trace them out to their original. For he calleth these of Colchis (now, Mengrelia) Sanni Henochis; Ptolemy, Zani; beyond which an hundred & fifty mile Eastward, he findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond these he again discovereth a third Nation, from whence all the rest took beginning, which inhabited on the West side of the mountains of Paropamisus; between them and the great River of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North side; and these Henochii are due East from the Region of Eden, and Eastward from the very Garden it self.

And although we cannot be assured that these Henochii took name from the memory of the City of Enoch directly; yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spread themselves Westward (as all Noah's Sons did that came into Shinar) the conjecture is far more probable than that of Annius the Friar, who sets Enoch in Phenicia, quite contrary to Moses word: Phenicia from all parts of Eden, being directly West.

And besides these several Nations of the Henochii, Stephanus findeth a Region called Henochia, and the same also in the East, with divers mountains about Bactria and Sogdiana, of the same name. Only the Grecians (according to their fabulous inventions of all things else) out of the word (Henochoi) which signifieth Cart or Coach-men, make these Nations to have sprung from the Waggoners of Cassor and Pollux (to wit) Aurighes and Telechus, who attended them in the inter-prize of Jason into Colchis. And though I do not deny, but that Jason, with other Greeks, ranged the coasts of Asia the less, in an open Boat or kind of small Gally,* of whom I shall speak in his own time: yet no man doubteth but that the tale of the golden Fleece was for the most part Poetical; and withall, that in such an open Boat, which could hardly carry their own Rowers, being fifty four, there was no place, and less use, of Coach-horses or Waggoners.

§. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cain's Generation.

But of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the City of Enoch in prophane Story, thus much may suffice: Now it followeth to answer some few Objections against certain particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which, for the first, it is demanded, How it was possible for Cain (having no other assistance than his Son Enoch) to perform such a Work as the building of a City, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a mass of all sorts of materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious Race) Moses useth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his divine Reason, seeing that he containeth the whole Story of the first Race, which lasted, by the least account, 1656 years, in five short Chapters: Yet thus much may every man borrow of his own weakest reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generations of mens lives so long a measure as 800. and 900. years, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and means to build many such Cities as Enoch, be the capacity answering to what other of the World forever: for in what Age of Cain's life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whose times, and the times of his issues, Moses had the least care. And as it is said of Cain, that he built a City: so it was said of Noah, that his three Sons peopled all the World; but in both, the process of time required, is to be understood: which advice, seeing Moses useth where the space less requireth quireth it, as knowing that he write the Scriptures to reasonable men, we may easily understand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference between the birth of Abel, and the oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fuit autem post dies multos, or a fine dierum (that is) in process of time, it came to pass that Cain brought an oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to be understood of Cain, that many years foregone, and when his people were increased, he built the City of Enoch or Henocho.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of solomon, that he built the Temple of Jerusalem; yet it is well known of solomon, that he employed in that Work 150000. labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selves to say, the King invaded, when he caused an invasion to be made: and he built, when he commanded such a building. And therefore seeing that we find that Moses had no regard to the ages, birth, or death of any of Cain's issues, it is not to be marvelled at, why he also passeth over in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: Cain also knew his wife, who conceived and bare Enoch, and he built a city, and called the name of the city after the name of his Son Enoch. And to Enoch was born Irad, and Irad begat Methusael, and Methusael begat Methusael, and Methusael Lamech.

Now, of Seth, Moses writeth far otherwise, and in this manner: *And Seth lived an hundred and five years, and begat Enoch, and Seth lived after he begat Enoch 807. years, and begat Sons and Daughters: so as all the days of Seth were 912. years, and he dyed: as for the years and times of the wicked, they were not numbered in Libro viventium, saith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God established, from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and work Moses walked in, and finished it with care, passing over the reprobate Generation, (as aforesaid.) Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembreth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one; and of the Line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth.*

| 4 Cainan . | 9 Lamech , |
| 5 Mabaleel . | and |
| 6 Jared . | 10 Noah . |

These be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Jephthas giveth unto Lamech threefold and seventeen Sons and daughters, by his two Wives, Ada and Sylla: and to these three Sons of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the invention of Pastorage, of Musick, and the working in Metal; for it seemeth that Jubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were untamed, and brought them into Herds and Drovers: Tubal invented Musick, and Tubal-Cain the working in Brass and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanical, the third given to idleness and pleasure. In whom began these three meaner degrees of Shepherds, Handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the issues of Seth began the Services of God, Divinity, Prophecie, and Astronomy: the Children of the one beheld the Heavens, the other the Earth.

§. IV.

Of the diversities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Children.

A Second scruple hath been made, How it came to pass that the Patriarchs begat their children at so divers Ages, as Cainan or Cenan at seventy years, Mabaleel and Enoch at threescore and five years, whereas Jared begat not any of his until he was 162. years old: Methusael begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. years. Now this difference hath been the more enforced, because it cannot be conjectured, that either Jared, Methusael, or Lamech abstained from Marriage out of the Religion of Abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular Sanctitie, begat children before he was threescore and ten years old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the Generations before the Flood precisely, according to the first-begotten and eldest Sons of the Patriarchs, but he drew down the Line of Noah from Seth. and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestours, were they elder or younger, as he found them: for it is likely that Enoch was not the eldest of Jared, nor Lamech the first-born of Methusael.

thusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing known to the contrary, but that Noah might have had many Sons before Shem, Ham, and Japhet, though these three were only named, and surviving, and which by God were reserved to be the Fathers of mankind after the Flood; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to be begotten by Kenan at threecore and ten years, who was the first Son of Kenan, and then reckon that Methusalem begat Lamech in the 187. year of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses rejecteth all the other Sons of Methusalem but Lamech only, because he was the Father of Noah, as aforesaid. Of this Saint Augustine hath somewhat else in his twentieth, and one and twentieth Chapters, De Civitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the Generations of the first Age, and so to Abraham, and the children of the promise after him; so doth St. Matthew recite the Genealogy of Christ, not by the eldest Sons, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first-born, who have hereby the prerogative in Estates, worldly and transitory only; and therefore the Evangelist nameth Isaac, and not Ismael, though Ismael were first in time: so doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Esau the elder; neither is Christ derived from any of the three eldest Patriarchs, Reuben, Simeon, or Levi, but from Juda a fourth Brother, and so from David, a younger Son of Jesse; and lastly, we find, that the Kingdom it self of Juda was not given to the Heir in Nature, but to the Heir of Grace, namely Solomon.

§. V.

Of the long lives of the Patriarchs, and some of late memory.

THE third Objection is, that the great difference of years between those of the first Age, whereof some of them had well near been a thousand years, makes it disputable, whether the account of times were of the same measure as in after-Ages, seeing that soon after the Flood, men lived not a third part of that time; and in succeeding Ages, and to this day, not the tenth.

They that have hereon resolved that those years were but Lunar years (to wit) of a month, or thereabouts, or Egyptian years, are easily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enosh in the year of his life an hundred and five, if those years be taken but for months, then had Seth lived but eight years and one moneth when he begat Enosh: and if the time of Enosh have the same allowance when he begat Kenan, then could Enosh at that time have been but six years and forty eight weeks old; and so it may be gathered of the rest, excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the trees in their kind, bearing Fruit and Seed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to give an ability of generation at six, seven, or eight years, agreeth with the short lives of the Pigmies, and not with the constitutions of our first Fathers, who being descended from Adam, the workmanship of Gods hands, and begotten and born in the strong youth of the World, had length of dates, and ability of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunar years, then there would follow this extremity, that those which lived longest, and upwards of nine hundred years, had by that account but the time of fourscore and ten and odd years; which were not only less by far than the Patriarchs lived after the Flood, but short of many mens lives in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed fourscore, and some an hundred years. Further (if need be) to disprove this reckoning, whereas it is written, Gen. 25. That Abraham died in a good Age, an old man, and of great years: all which (if the former account were of Lunar years) makes but seventeen and an half of our years.

And if we seek for a cause of this long life in Nature, then is it reasonable, that the first man, created in highest perfection, should also beget children of equal strength or little differing: lot of the first and purest seed, there must of necessity spring up the fairest and fruitfulest plants. Secondly, the Earth it self was then much less corrupt, which yielded her increase, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any such mixture of harmful quality, as since that time the curse of God, for the cruelty of mans heart, brought on it and mankind: Neither had the waters of the Flood infused such an impurity, as thereby the natural and powerful operation of all Plants, Herbs, and Fruits upon the Earth received a qualification and harmful change. And as all things under the Sun have one time of strength, and another of weakness, a youth and beauty, and then age and deformity: so Time it self (under the deathful shade of whose wings all things decay and wither) hath waited and worn out that lively virtue of Nature in Man, and Beasts, and Plants; yea the Heavens themselves, being of a most pure and cleancast matter, shall wax old as a garment; and and then much more the power generative in inferior Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receive operative Virtue from the superiority.

But besides the old Age of the World, how far doth our education and simplicity of living differ from that old time? The tender bringing up of Children, first fed and nourished with the Milk of a strange Dugge; an unnatural curiosity having taught all Women (but the Beggar) to find out Nurseries, which necessity only ought to commend unto them: The hasty Marriages in tender years, wherein, Nature being but yet green and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her self hath not yet any root sufficient to maintain her own top; and such half-ripe seeds (for the most part) in their growing up wither in the bud, and was old even in their Infancy. But above all things, the exceeding luxuriousness of this glutinous age, wherein we press Nature with over-weighty burthens, and finding her strength defective, we take the work out of her hands, and commit it to the artificial help of strong Waters, hot Spices, and provoking Sawces; of which Lucan hath these elegant Verses:

Luxuriet, nunquam parvo contenta paratu;
Et quæstorum terra pelagoque ciborum
Ambitiosa jamer, & laute gloria mense, Discite quam parvo liceat producere vitam:
Et quantum natura petat.
Non auro myrrhæque bibunt: sed eurgite puro
Vitis redit: sativæ est populus, fluviusque Cereque.*

O wastfull Riot never well content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of Cates by Land and Sea far fetcht and sent;
Vain-glory of a Table sumptuous,
Learn with how little life may be preserved.
In Gold and Myrrhe they need not to caroule,
But with the Brook the peoples thirst is served;
Who fed with Bread and Water are not starved.

The Egyptians affirm, that the longest time of man's life is an hundred years, because the heart in a perfect body waxeth and groweth to strength fifty years, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philosophy, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty years, and Berosus to an hundred and seventeen years. These opinions Pliny repeateth and reproveheth, producing many examples to the contrary. In the last taxation, number, and review of the eighth Region of Italy, there were found in the Roll (saith Pliny) four and fifty persons of an hundred years of age: seven and fifty of an hundred and ten: two of an hundred and five and twenty: four of an hundred and thirty: as many that were an hundred and five and thirty, or an hundred and seven and thirty years old: and last of all, three men of an hundred and forty: and this search was made in the times of Vespasian the Father, and the Son.

The simple diet and temperate life of the Esians, gave them long account of many years: so did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Persian Magicians, and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirm, out of Homer, that Nestor lived three Ages, and Tirghis six, Sybilla three hundred years, Endymion of the Isle Asia, little less: Allo Masanissa of Namidia lived very long, and Dando of Illyria. Among the Kings of Aradia many lived three hundred years (saith Epiphorus). Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epians, that some of them lived full two hundred years; and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians: and that these reports are not fabulous; Josephus bringeth many witnesses with himself; as Marebon, Berosus, Alochus, Elime, Hieronymus, Epigenes, Hecateus, Epiphorus, and others. And Anthony Fume, an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the year 1570. there was an Indian presented to Solyman, General of the Turke Army, who had out-lived three hundred years. I my self knew the old Countess of Desmond of Inchiquin in Munster, who lived in the year 1589. and many years since, who was married in Edward the Fourth's time, and held her joynture from all the Earls of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munster can witness: Strozzius Sicogna, out of Torquemada, Maffens, and the like Authours, telleth of some that have not only far exceeded the term prescribed by Epigenes; but been repaired from the withered estate of decrepit age to fresh youth. But for length of life, if we note but the difference between the ability of men in those days wherein Galen the Physician lived, it may easily prove unto us, what Reeds we are in respect of those Cedars of the first Age. For Galen did ordinarily let Blood six pound weight, whereas we (for the most part) stop at six ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Constellations) which are the natural causes of a long and healthfull life; (to wit) strong Parents, Parents, a pure and thin ayr, and temperate use of diet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldering stone, cannot stand long upright; on Ayr we feed alwaies and in every instant, and on meats but at times: and yet the heavy load of abundance, wherewith we oppress and overcharge Nature, maketh her to sink unawares in the mid-way; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure Ayr, and a temperate use of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs delivering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

A Fourth scruple hath been made, How the certain knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Story thereof written; and if any such had been, yet it is conceived, that all memory of Antiquity perished in the Universal Flood.

But if we consider the curiosity and policy of elder Ages, we shall find, that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also covered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Jewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreverent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoever was attained unto concerning God, and his working in Nature, the same was not left to publick dispute, but delivered over by heart and tradition from wise men to a posterity equally Zealous; Ex animo in animum sine literis, medio intercedente verbo: From mind to mind without Letters, by way of Tradition or word of mouth. And as it was thought by Esdrae, Origen, and Hilarius (as Mirandula conceiveth) that Moses did not only upon the Mount receive the Law from God, but withal, secretiorem & veram legem narratiorem; a more secret and true explanation of the Law; which (saith he, out of the same Authors,) he delivered by mouth to Joshua, and Joshua to the Elders: for, to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quàm dare sanctam canibus; & inter porcos spargere Margaritas; then to give holy things to Dogs, and to cast Pearls before swine. In succeeding times this understanding and wisdom began to be written in Ciphers and Characters, and Letters bearing the form of Beasts, Birds, and other creatures; and to be taught only to such as served in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Jews was an imitation: the invention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely.

This Cabala importeth a Law, received by tradition and unwritten. Cabala is Hebrew is Receptio in Latine, and a Receiving in English. And this custome was also held by the Druids and Bards of our ancient Brittains, and of latter times by the Irish Chroniclers called Rimers. If then such as would seem wisest in the use of reason, will not acknowledge, that the story of the Creation or beginning of all things, was written by inspiration, the Holy-Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by Tradition (then used) be delivered unto him: by a more certain presumption, then any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had preserved and left to their successors: which their wife men (as they terme them) did lay up and defend from the injury of the time and other hazards. For, leaving to remember, that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem lived together with Adam himself two hundred forty and three years, and Noah with Methusalem no less then five hundred years: and, before Noah died, Abraham was fifty and eight years old: from whence this knowledge by an easie and ordinary way might come to Israel, and so to Moses.

But besides this Tradition, it is questionless, that the use of Letters was found out in the very infancy of the world, proved by those Prophecies written on Pillars of Stone and Brick by Enoch: of which Josephus affirmeth, that one of them remained even in his time (meaning belike some ruin or foundation thereof) which Pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these Prophecies of Enoch, St. Jude testifieth; and some part of his Books (which contained the course of the Stars, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia felix, in the Dominion of the Queen of Saba (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth, that he had seen, and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation, and story of the first Age, seeing he might receive it both by Tradition and Letter, had not the spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange Miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Now for the Books of Enoch, howsoever some men make mention of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Bedæ, Procopius, John pius, Gaxem (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to prove them unwritten Traditions, alledgeth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphal Scriptures (which he rejecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembered out of them, the same was delivered by Tradition from the Jews. But I rather think with Petrus, that such a Book there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added thereunto by Hereticks, who took occasion upon the antiquity thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Devil about the body of Moses, to frame and add thereunto many inventions of their own. One of the greatest arguments against these Books, is, that neither Philo nor Josephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquity) make mention thereof. But against it I will let this opinion of St. Augustine, scriptis quidem nonnulla divina Enoch, illum septimum ab Adam, negare non possumus: That Enoch the seventh from Adam, did write divers divine things, we cannot deny. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquity, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Book was found amongst those Canonical Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Judaico (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth, that this Book might be preserved by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the Prophecies remembered by Jude, no man can deny; how they were delivered to posterity, I know not; whether by the Jews Cabala, or by what other means, the same is but mans conjecture. And (certainly) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heavens, and of the natures and conjunctions of the Stars; and afterwards to some of his Sons, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had seen and might preserve this book. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly invented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath been said before. And therefore if Letters and Arts were known from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah lived with Methusalem, who lived with Adam, and Abraham lived with Noah; it is not strange (I say) to conceive how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by Letters, or by Cabala and Tradition, had the undoubted Word of God need of any other proof then self-authority.

§. VII.

Of the men of renown before the Flood.

NOW let us consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seven descents of Cain's children: and of Adam by Seth, ten; Seth being given by God in stead of Abel: And of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to profess Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publick. For although Adam instructed his Children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the Sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the death of Enosh, men began publicly to call on the Name of the Lord, that is, they served and praised God by Communion and in publick manner, or calling upon the Name of the Lord; and thereby were the Sons of God, or the Godly, distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the Son of Seth, to the time of Henoch the Son of Jared, there is nothing remembered by Moses, but their own births, the birth of their Sons, the length of their lives, and deaths. But of Henoch it is written: He walked with God, and he was no more seen: for God took him away. By that, that he walked before God, was meant, that he was a just and upright man, and that he feared, loved, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses useth of Noah: Noah was a just and upright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Seventy convert it, Enoch placuit Deo; Enoch pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra, and others, understand this place, (tulit eum Deus) felicitet, mortuus est; God took him away, (that is) he dyed, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God took him away when he died; yet the difference which Moses maketh between the piety of Henoch, and the rest of the Patriarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he useth to all else, makes it manifest, that Henoch was not dissolved as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses useth these words, And he dyed; but of Henoch he spake otherwise, saying only, He was missing, or, he was not seen. Et non inveniebatur (saith the Apostle to the Hebrews) quia Deus eum transiit; And he was not found, for the Lord took him away. In the same place it is expressly added, that he was not dead.

But whether this taking away of Henoch were not with the same kind of changing which St. Paul promisseth, when he saith, that, when the end shall come, we shall not all die, but but all shall be changed, I leave it to the learned Divines.

After Enoch, Moses passeth over to Methusalem and Lamech, remembering (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: saying that Lamech prophesied of his Son Noah, Gen. 5. 29. saying, This same shall comfort us concerning our work, and sorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply than of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, being the last of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his Family) preserved, because he was an upright man in his time, and feared God.

But of the war, peace, government, and policy of those strong and mighty men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memory remaining: whose stories, if they had been preserved, and what else was then performed in that newness of the world, there could nothing of more delight have been left to Posterity. For the exceeding long lives of men (who to their strength of body and natural wits, had the experience added of 800, and 900. years) how much of necessity must the same adde of wisdom and undertakings? Likely it is, that their works excelled all whatsoever can be told of aftertimes, especially in respect of this old age of the world, when we no sooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to Hippocrates: Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus preceps; (which is) Life is short, art is long, time is headlong. And that those people of the first Age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of those words of Moses; These were mighty men, which in old time were men of renown. But these men of renown (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of body, and cruelty of mind) trusted so much to their own abilities, as they forgot altogether the piety of Seth, and the ways wherein Enoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were evil, only evil and continually evil. And this wickedness was not only found in the issues of Cain, but it was then universal, when the children and Sons of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and misled by their Idolatrous Wives, the Daughters of Cain, or of those other men, loving themselves and the world only.

That these Sons of God were Angels, which being taken with the beauty of women, accompanied them, and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed; namely, Lullantius and Engibius, misled by Iosephus: of whom I can not doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers have taken great advantage, and have troubled themselves with large answers, and very needles; the question being incapable of dispute, especially since S. Chrysostom and S. Augustine have answered it largely long ago. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth every where appear in Scripture; and on the contrary, to think that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) behold the face of God, (that is) always attend his commandments, should after a separation from the rest which fell with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrary both to Nature and Grace, were more than madness to imagine.

§. VIII.

That the Giants, by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also, divers in later times.

OF these Giants which Moses calleth mighty men, Goropius Becanus an Antuerpian (who thought his own wit more Gigantical than the bodies of Nimrod, or Hercules) hath written a large Discourse, intitled, Gigantomachia; and strained his brains to prove, that there were never any such men: his reasons (whoever desires to lose time) he may find them in the Treatise before named. It is true, that Cyrillus reproves the Grecian Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirm shamelessly, That the Giants have in elder times, not only cast up Mountains upon Mountains, but removed Islands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that invention of casting up Hills, and making War with the gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the Story of Nimrod, as before remembered; and even out of this Scripture. That the Sons of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit, taken from Orpheus and Hesiodus. That Giants were the Sons of the Heaven and the Earth; meaning by the Heavens the Sons of God, and by the Earth, the Daughters of Men: which verses of Orpheus are by John Cassian (who hath written a very witty Discourse of this Subject) thus changed into Latine:

Orti quid terrâ fuerint & sanguine celi.*

From th' Earth, and from thy blood, O heaven, they came,
Whom thereupon the gods did Giants name.

But

But what will not Opinators, and self-believing men dispute of, and make doubt of; if they cannot conceive that there were in the first Age such kind of men; and of which there have been in all times since; seeing the Scriptures avow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superlative straining of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was given to Oppressors and Tyrants, and not to strength of body, and eminent stature: such men might with better reason call them Oppressors, because they were Giants; and therefore had ability to oppress, than say, That they were called Giants only, because Oppressors. For first, Moses himself calleth them mighty men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards men of renown (that is) of great undertaking and adventurous actions. And if the same stature of body, and ability, had not been found among divers Nations after the general Flood, then might this place of Moses have more willingly hearkened to a dispute, and yielded to interpretation.

But besides all these famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I will reserve to accompany the Giants of Allion, in the Story of Britany) the Scriptures do clearly, and without all Allegorical construction, avow, That besides Nimrod, there were found of these Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Josiah, and of David; namely, the Rephaims in Asteroth; the Zuzai, or Zanzumims in Hana; and the Emims which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab; whom Moses (for stature) compareth with the Anakims which dwelt in Hebron; for they also were taken for Giants as the Anakims. Likewise where Moses speaketh of the Land of Ammon, he useth these words: That also was taken for a Land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein afore-times: and, whom the Ammonites call Zanzumims; a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these Giants called Rephaims in Asteroth and Karnaim, and the Zuzai or Zanzumims, Cederlaomer, King of Elam, overthrew, assisted by other Kings his associates. Also the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites, men of Giant-like stature, whom he compareth to the Cedar, and whose strength to the Oaks: and the Prophet Baruch, These were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature, and so expert in war. Particularly, it is written of Og King of Basan, that his bed of Iron was nine Cubits long, and four Cubits broad: for only Og King of Basan remained of the remnant of the Giants who commanded the Kingdom of Basan four hundred years after the Expedition of Cederlaomer. Moreover, those Discoverers and Searchers of the Land of Promise (sent by Moses from Cadesbarne in Paran) made report at their return of the great stature of those people in general, and especially of the Sons of Anak in these words: All the people which we saw in it, are men of great stature: for there we saw Giants, the Sons of Anak, which come of the Giants, so that we seemed in our fight, like Grasshoppers, and so we were in their own judgments a marvellous difference between the Anakims and themselves: inasmuch that the Israelites were so stricken with fear, as they rather fought, and desired, to return again into Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former slavery, than to fall by the strokes of those fearful Nations. Furthermore, the Scriptures put us out of doubt, that Goliath the Philistine of Gath, was a Giant of six Cubits and a span long: the Armour which he wore, weighed five thousand shekels of Brass: the shaft of his spear was like a Weavers beam, and his spear head weighed six hundred shekels of Iron. Also in Sammel there is mention of another Goliath, surnamed Gethseu, because he was of Gath: and of three other Giants; of which the first was slain by Jonathan, David's Nephew, who had twelve fingers, and as many toes: a man of great stature, and his fingers were by sixes, even four and twenty.

Also that Samson was of surpassing strength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had been a Kid, and after slew thirty of the Philistines, and (after that) a thousand more of them with a Jaw-bone of an Ass: And lastly, he took the gates of Azzah, and the two posts, and lifted them away with the bars, and put them upon his shoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountain before Elron. If then it be approved by every judgment, that both Nature, and the Heavens wax old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it self) infeebled and almost worn out the virtue of all things, then, I say, That as in all other kinds the Earth (before that Sin had increased the curse and corruption) brought forth her young ones more strong and beautiful, than it did in after ages: so also those Giants, those mighty men, and men of renown, as far exceeded the proportion, nature, and strength of those Giants, remembered by Moses of his own time, and after him their successors, as the ordinary proportion of men in general, soon after the Flood, and in times far off, exceeded the bulks and bodies of men which are now born in the withered quarter quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth Age, much more in the first flourishing youth and newness of the World.

But the wickedness (especially in cruelty and oppression) of these men was such, as God therefore by the Flood, gave end to all flesh, but to the just Noah and his Family. And God repented him that he had made man: which Saint Augustine thus expounds: Neque enim sicut hominem, ita Deum facti sui penitet, cuius est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia, quam certa prescientia. Sed si non utatur Scriptura talibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiaris insinuat omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consilium: ut & percreant superbientes, & exerceat negligentes, & exerceat quærentes, & aliat intelligentes, & God (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done (as men use to do) but if the Scripture did not use those words, or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it self familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it should provide: that it might terrify the proud, stir up the negligent, exercise the searchers of the truth, and nourish those that understand.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the World; and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient Times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

That in old Corruptions, we may find some signs of more ancient Truth.

Here, before we proceed any further, the occasion offereth it self for us to consider how the Greeks, and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inventions, and by breaking into parts the Story of the Creation, and by delivering it over in a mystical fence, wrapping it up mixed with other their own trumpery, have sought to obscure the truth thereof; and have hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receive those inter-mixed Discourses of God and Nature, for the inventions of Poets and Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stoln out of the Books of God. But, as a skillfull and learned Chyrmist can as well by separation of visible elements draw helpful Medicines out of poison, as poison out of the most healthfull Herbs and Plants (all things having in themselves both life and death) so, contrary to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those that seek after God and Truth, find out every where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Story of the first Age, with all the works and marvels thereof, amply and lively expressed.

That the Corruptions themselves were very ancient, as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

But this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in men (the one having erred but once, the other ever) as concerning Man-kind, it took such effect, that thereby (the liberal Grace of God being withdrawn) all the posterity of our first Parents were afterwards born and bred in a world, suffering a perpetual Eclipse of spiritual light. Hence it was that it produced Plants of such imperfection and harmful quality, as the waters of the general flood could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of man-kind. Yea, even among the few Sons of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former poison. For as the children of Shem did inherit the virtues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the Sons of Cham did possess the vices of the Sons of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chaldeans began, soon after the Flood, to ascribe divine power and honour to the Creature, which was only due to the Creator. First, they worshipped the Sun, and then the Fire. So the Egyptians and Phœnicians Phœnicians did not only learn to leave the true God, but created twelve several Gods, and divine powers, whom they worshipped, and unto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus saith, Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Egyptios in usu habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis cepisse mutatos, eosque prius Aras, & Imagines, & Tempia Divis, sibi erexisse; The Egyptians (saith he) first devised the names of the twelve gods; which the Greeks received from them, who first erected unto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples, for the gods.

§. III.

That in process of time, these lesser errors drew on greater: as appeareth in the gross Superstitions of the Egyptians.

But as men once fallen away from undoubted truth, do then after wander for evermore in vices unknown, and daily travel towards their eternal perdition: so did these gross and blind Idolaters, every Age after other, descend lower and lower, and shrink and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortal men only, but they gave divine reverence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowls, Winds, Earth, Water, Air, Fire, to the Morning, to the Evening, to Plants, Trees, and Roots, to Passions and Affections of the Mind, to Paleness, Sickness, Sorrows, yea, to the most unworthy and basest of all these. Which barbarous blasphemy, Rhodius Alexander derideth in this manner:

Tu maximum Anquillam Deum putas: ego Obsoniorum credidi suavissimum.

I broyl th' Egyptian Eccles, which you (as god) implore:
You fear to eat the flesh of Swine; I find it sweet.
You worship Dogs; to beat them I think meet,

And in this manner Juvenal.

§. IV.

That from the reliques of Ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were invented: and the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

But in so great a confusion of vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of these inventions were borrowed, or after what ancient pattern they erected their building, were it not certain that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoever was done therein, partly from some inscriptions upon stone or metal remaining after the Flood; and partly from Mizraim the Son of Cham, who had learn'd the fame of Cham, and Cham of his Father Noah: for, all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times, cannot be fained: and though other Nations after them had by imitation their Jupiters also, their Saturns, Vulcans, and Mercuries, with the rest, which S. Augustine out of Varro, Eusebius out of many prophane Histories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more have observed, to wit, the Phœnicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greeks, and other Nations; yet was Cain, the Son of Adam, (as some very learned men conceive) called and reputed for the first and ancient Jupiter; and Adam for the first Saturn: for Jupiter was said to have invented the founding of Cities; and the first City of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochites, before remembrance. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Hyginus in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For besides that many Cities were founded by divers men; Tamen primam latissimam à primo & antiquissimo Jove edificatam: yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient Jupiter, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moses: And Cain dwelt towards the East side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochites were found after the Flood. And therefore was Jupiter by the Athenians called Polus, Gen. 4. 16.

§. IV.

That from the reliicks of Ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were invented: and the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubal-Cain, &c.

But in so great a confusion of vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of these inventions were borrowed, or after what ancient pattern they erected their building, were it not certain that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoever was done therein, partly from some inscriptions upon stone or metal remaining after the Flood; and partly from Misraim the Son of Cham, who had learn'd the fame of Cham, and Cham of his Father Noah: for, all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times, cannot be fained: and though other Nations ascer them had by imitation their Jupiters also, their Saturns, Vulcans, and Mercuries, with the rest, which *S. a Founder of Cities, and Heroicior, an Incloser, or Strengthener of Cities (ay Phornutus and Pausanias;) and that to Jupiter Heroicior, there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And, that there were Cities built before the Flood, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that, soon after mankind began to increase, they built many Cities; which, as his meaning, he delivereth in plain terms, in his third Book of Laws: for he saith, that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great Flood.

This first Jupiter of the Ethnicks was then the same Cain, the Son of Adam, who marrying his own Sister (as also Jupiter is said to have done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de Urbibus placeth the City Henocho. And besides this City of Henocho, Philo Judæus conceiveth that Cain built six others; as Maich, Jared, Tehe, Jefeh, Selet, and Gebus: but where Philo had this, I know not. Now, as Cain was the first Jupiter, and from whom also the Ethnicks had the invention of Sacrifice: so were Jabal, Jubal and Tubal-Cain (inventors of Pastorage, Smith-craft, and Music) the same which were called by the ancient prophane Writers, Mercurius, Vulcan, and Apollo. And as there is a likelihood of name between Tubalcain and Vulcan: so doth Augustine expound the name of Noëma, or Namamah, the Sister of Tubalcain, to signify Venus, or beautiful, Ephesus, or pleasure, as the Wife of Vulcan is said to be Venus, the Lady of pleasure and beauty. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturnus; Cain, the eldest Jupiter; Eva, Rhea and Nomea, or Namamah the first Venus: so did the Fable of the dividing of the World, between the three Brethren, the Sons of Saturnus, arise from the true Story of the dividing of the Earth betwixt the three Brethren the Sons of Noah: so also was the fiction of those golden Apples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent which tempted Eva: so was Paradise itself transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides; the Prophecies, that Christ should break the Serpents head, and conquer the power of Hell, occasioned the Fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Hesperides, and descending into Hell, and captivating Cerberus: so out of the taking up of Henocho by God, was borrowed the conversion of their Heroes (the inventors of Religion, and such Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Stars, and heavenly Signes, and (withall) that leaving of the World, and ascension of Astræa: of which Ovid;

Ovid. Met. Ultima cælestium terras Astræa reliquit, Afræa last of heavenly Wights the Earth did leave.

For although thereby the Ethnicks would understand Justice itself to have failed, as it is a virtue abstract, and may be considered without a person, yet, as it is usual among the ancient Poets to describe Virtues and Vices by the persons of men and women, as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beauty by Venus; so do they also the persons of men by like Virtues and Vices, and therefore by Justice and Astræa, Enoch, the justice and piety of Enoch, being in the same manner expressed, as that of Noah was by Noë; for Noah was said to be a just man: And Noah walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, That he walked with God, and he was no more seen: for God took him away.

From this Story also of the first Age, and from that part where Augustus remembereth the Giants begotten by the Sons of good men upon the Daughters of the wicked, whom Augustus calleth mighty men, and men of renown, did they steal those wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerful Giants; and again, their War undertaken against the Gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as St. Augustine termeth him. Which war of their Giants, Cornelius Severus thus describeth.

The Giants did advance their wicked hand Against the Stars, to thrust themselves along down; And robbing Jove of his Imperial Crown, On conquer'd Heavens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant, that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel, to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deep, nor by any conjunction of the Stars, should bury them under the moisture of a second Flood, but that by this building (if they had been herein victorious) they would have given the Law to Heaven itself: Also the making of leagues, peace and covenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by Sacrifice, wherof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Æneids hath a touch, was (as it seemeth) borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. who, when he read the Book of the Covenant, sprinkled the people with blood.

We find also many remembrances of Seth, the paternal Ancestor of Henocho and Noah: for Amnephio, the same King of Egypt which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the the children of Israel (as of late some learned men, mistaking his time, supposed) called his Son and Successour, Sethos, of Seth: and of the same Seth (as many men of good judgment have granted) were the Princes of Tharæ, called Southers, wherof there were many very famous. But herein was the memory of Seth most manifestly preserved, that the Egyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient Deity, and of the first Tradition: in honour of whom they called a principal Province Sethitis. We also find in Ethiopia the City of Sethis, and others of the same name elsewhere: And sure, from the Egyptians did the Grecians borrow this kind of Theologie, though they turned to acknowledge any antiquity preceding their own: and that they might not seem to learn elsewhere, they gave the same names to their own Idols, which the Egyptians did to theirs.

Of the three chiefest Jupiters, and the strange story of the third.

But of all those Armies of Jupiters, remembered by the Antients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers have also done, who sought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Jupiter, the Son of Anter and Dia, so called because the one had reference to his Celestial condition (for Anter is as much as shining or pure fire) the other discovered his natural virtues, which dates and times make more perfect, and are the witnesses of mens actions.

The second was said to be the Son of Cælim or Heaven, for the same former respects; and this Jupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Abethas.

The third, of whom all the Grecian fables were devised, was of Croto (now Candæ), the Son of Saturnus and Ops. The name derived from the Latine is taken of Juvans pater, from the Greek word Zeus; it signifieth life, but somewhat strained. Hecæus in his Genealogie of the Gods, conceiveth, that his name was borrowed from Jupiter the Planet; but whether that Star had such a name, before the same was given to men, I know not. Jupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, adventurous, liberal, merciful, loving, and faithful (that is) giving their inclinations. And therefore those ancient Kings beautified with these conditions, might be called thereafter Jupiter: but howsoever they were, or were not with those virtues enriched, yet by imitation, all Kings in the eldest times assumed those Titles and Surnames: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honour and reputation in the world (howsoever deserved) as the wealthiest that ever were, acquired by their well-deservings. Joves omnes Reges vocarunt antiqui, the antients called all Kings Jupiters, as Strabo in his varia historia confirmeth; Reges olim Joves vocarunt omnes; In old times all Nations call'd their Kings Jupiters. But where this last and most remembered Jupiter was born, it is uncertain. Somewhere are, that make him of Crete: others that he was but sent thither by his Mother Ops, or Opis, to be fostered and hidden from the fury of Titanus his Uncle: because it was conditioned, between Saturnus and Titanus, that Saturnus being a younger Brother, and reigning (for his own life), by Titanus permission, he should put to death all his male children, lest the Titanus might be interrupted by any one of them in their succession, which agreement, because Saturnus performed in his first born, it is feigned that Saturnus devoured his own children. Hæcæus Lyophræon, thus turned into Laræ.

Hand sit pinguis, Cruidis sepulchrum quid sit iste filius.

Saturnus to be the father is not known, By being the grave and burial of his own.

This composition between Titanus and Saturnus, Syllia also witnesseth in these words

Conceptis verbis Titan jurare coegit Saturnum, de se natum ne vivat illam, Sed possit regnare, scitis post fata, Nepotes.

Things thus agreed; Titan made Saturnus swear

No Son to nourish, which by reigning might Urp the right of Titanus lawful heir.

But Ops the Mother of Jupiter, being delivered at once both of Jupiter and Juno conveyed Jupiter (first called Isis) into Crete, as he did afterwards his two Brothers, Neptunus and Pluto: where he was brought up in Gnosus, the chief City of that Island, by Cressa the King, or by the Curetes, a people and nation thereof.

Others challenge him to be of Thebes and a Theban; others call him an Arcadian; others make him of Messene. The like contention is found among the Greeks touching his education and first fostering. Some affirm that he was fed by Hony-bees: in recompence wherof he changed their black coats and and skins into yellow; a reward well fitting such a God; others, that he was nourished by Bears; others, by Goats; and of all these the idle Greeks have many pretty tales. But in the end, when Titan had knowledge that Saturn had broken his faith, he set on him, and took him and his wife prisoners, whom Jupiter again rescued and delivered.

But lastly, the Father and the Son equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturn being the less powerful, fled into Italy, and left his Kingdom in Greece to his Son. And although this Prince at the first purchased great honour, and for his many virtues, the name of Jupiter was given him: yet after he was once settled, and became potent, he gave himself over wholly to palliardize and adultery, without all respect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by such as do ascribe the actions of many to one Jupiter, that notwithstanding this, he was afterwards known to offend in the sin of Sodom with Cratinus and others: and did not only begin with incest, marrying his own Sister Phoebe, but he ravished, betrayed, stole away, and took by strong hand all the beautiful women born in his time, within the limits of his own Kingdoms, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greatest fame; Niobe, Laodamia, and Alcmene, the Wife of Amphytrion, by whom he had Phlegon, Sarpedon, Argos, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus, of whom the Mountain Taygetus took name; with another Son called Saon, of whom Saonius by Antigone he had Amphion and Zethus; by Leda, Cassiope and Kollis; Hellen and Clytemnestra; by Danae, Perseus; by Jordain, Deucalion; by Charme (the daughter of Evbulus) Briomantis; by Protogenia, he had Attilus the Father of Endymion: and by To (the daughter of Anachus) Epaphus, the founder of Nemphis in Egypt; which Epaphus, married Aliba, of whom that Country took name, for so the Greeks afterward called Africa: He ravished Megilla the Daughter of Aephus, and carried her into the Island Oenopia or Oenotria, afterward called Aegina, on whom he begat Aedon: by Torrhebia he had Mycesellanus and Carinus: by Ora, Colaxer: he had also Dardanius by Eledra, who built Dardanius, afterward Ilion or Troy. He begat the Brothers Talies on Thalia and on Garamantis, Harbati. He had besides these (if they be not their chief God) Phileus and Phrynius, inventors of the Bakers Craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be father to all these, who were born in Ages so far differing. And of these his several ravishments, betrayings, stealing away of mens Wives, Daughters, and Sons, buying of Virgins, and the like, came in all those ancient fables of his transformations into flowers of Gold, Eagles, Bulls, Birds, and Beasts; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Grecian forgeries. And yet did not the Greeks and Romans fear to entitle this Monster Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second Book, de natura Deorum, affirm, that he deserved nothing less; and in his Oration, pro domo sua, reprocheth Clodius for his incest, by the name of Jupiter. His burial was in Crete (saith Lucian). Cretenses non solum natum apud se, & sepulchrum Jovis vellent, sed etiam sepulchrum ejus ostendunt; The Cretians, or Candians, do not only avow that Jupiter was born and buried among them, but they shew his Grave and sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth; for in his time there remained the Monuments of his Tomb in the Mountain Jafus. This, Callimachus in his Hymns also witnesseth; but, as offended thereat, saith thus:

The Cretians ever lyars were, they care not what they say:
For they a Tomb have built for thee, O King, that liv'st alway.

Diodorus Siculus tells by way of report still from the Libyan Fables, confirmed (as he saith) by some Greek Writers, that the original of these Gods was from the Western parts of Africa. For there among the Atlantide reigned one Urannus (which signifieth Heaven) called so for his great skill in Astrology, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a God after his death. He had by many Wives forty five Sons; but by his principal Wife Tites, he had seventeen Sons and two Daughters, all which were called after their Mothers name, the Titanes. Of Tites, likewise it is said, that the for her goodnefs was Canonized as a Goddess, being dead, and called the Earth, as her Husband was styled Heaven. But of all the children of Tites, her Daughter Bastia (which name founding as Queen in English, she is by the Latine translation of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as far in virtue as in years, was by general consent of her Brethren, and of the People, appointed to rule as Queen after her Father's death, being as yet a Virgin. She took to husband her Brother Hyperion, to whom she bare a Son and a Daughter, called Sun and Moon. The beauty and towardliness of these children moved her Brethren to envie, and bred in them a fear of being excluded from the succession: wherefore they took the Boy and drowned drowned him in the River Eridanus, now called Poe. The loss of this child, caused his sister to break her own neck; and the loss of both her children, made the mother to play many mad pranks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wild fashion, in sight of all the people, before whom she is said to have vanished away. Ere she died, her Son (as the Fable hath it) signified unto her in a Dream, that he and his sister, by the providence of God, should become immortal; that also the Sun and Moon should be called by their names, and that their death should be revenged upon the Murderers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two Planets, and withall held her self as a goddess; and teamed her the great Mother, which name they had formerly given to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren whilst they were young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguished, the other Sons of Erannus divided the Kingdom. Of these, Atlas and Saturn were chief. Atlas reigned over the Countries lying about the Mountains, which afterward bare his name; a just and wise Prince, deeply skillful in Astrology: and, for invention of the sphere, said to have supported Heaven. He had many Sons; but the principal of them called Hesperus, being of his Fathers qualities and features, was said to have been carried away by the Wind, from the top of an high Hill, in the midst of his contemplations; and his name, in honour of him, imposed by the people upon the morning Starr. The seven Daughters of Atlas were also said to have been excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be Dified, or registred among the Worthies, brought forth children, answerable in quality to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the seven Stars, called Pleades, took name. Saturn, the brother of Atlas, reigned in Sicilia, part of Africa and Italy. Jupiter, another of the Sons of Urannus, reigned in Crete; who had ten Sons, which he called Curetes: he called that Island after his Wives name, Ida; in which life he died, and was buried. But this Jupiter must not have been that great one, but Uncle to the great Jupiter, if these Fables of the Lybians were true. Saturn (as these Lybians tell the tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keep his people in subjection. His sister Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africa; Hammon loving others as well as his Wife, or better, got a Daughter called Minerva, near to the River Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. He also begat on Amalthaea, a Son, called Bacchus, whom he caused secretly, for fear of his life, to be brought up at Nysa, an Island in the River Triton, under the tuition of his Daughter Minerva, and certain Nymphs. To Amalthaea he gave in reward a goodly Country, that lay on the Seacoast, bending in form like a Horn, whence grew the tale of Amalthaea's plentiful Horn, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these news, she fled from her Husband to her brother Saturn, who, not only entertained her as a sister, but took her to Wife, and at her instigation, made war upon Hammon, vanquished him by the assistance of the Titans, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Jupiter's children before mentioned, held the Island at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon: after the name of Crete the Kings Daughter, whom he took to Wife, and had with her (women, as may seem, being very gracious in those names) the Kingdom. Bacchus was grown a proper young man, had found out the making of Wine, the art of planting of Trees, and many things else commodious for man-kind, before the flight of his Mother-in-law. Now therefore, hearing report of all that had happened, and that Saturn was coming against him with the Titans; he levied an Army, to which the Amazons, living not far from Nysa, added great forces in love of Minerva, who was entred into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerva the women, they set forward against Saturn, met him, and overthrew him, and taking many of the Titans prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second Expedition. In the second Expedition he behaved himself so well, that he won the love of all the people by whom he passed; in so much, that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturn's rigorous government, he was greatly strengthened, and the Enemy as much enfeebled by daily revolts. Coming to the City of Hammon, he won a battel of Saturn before the very walls. After which, Saturn, with his Wife Rhea, fled by night, setting the Town on fire, to despoil Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entertained. Saturn had a young Son by Rhea, called Jupiter. This child Bacchus took with him in a great Expedition that he made into the East-Countries: and coming into Egypt, he left this Jupiter, being then a Boy, Governour of the Country; but appointed unto him as an Over-see, one Olympus, of whom Jupiter grew to be called Olympus. Whilst Bacchus travelled through all Nations, as far as into India,

India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titans had found out his father Hammon in Crete, and began to war upon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Jupiter from Egypt, and his sister Minerva, together with the rest, that afterwards were held gods, joining all their forces, went into Crete, overthrew the Titans, chased them, took and slew them, and freed the World of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were Deified; and the great Jupiter, the Son of Saturn, succeeding them; reigned Lord alone over all the world, having none of the Titans left alive, nor any other to disturb him. Between this tale of the Libyan gods, and the Egyptian Fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked Images of some one true History. For the Expeditions of Osiris and of Bacchus; the wars of the Giants in the one Story, of the Titans in the other; the Kingdom of Egypt given by Hercules Lybicus to Orus, by Bacchus to Jupiter, the rattles of Isis, and the Cymbals of Bastet, with many pretty circumstances, nearly enough resemble each other, howsoever not alike fitted to the right persons. Sancheziatus (as Eusebius cites him) would have all these to be Phenicians, and is earnest in saying, That it is a true Story, and no Allegory. Yet he makes it seem the more allegorical, by giving to Uranus or heaven for daughters, Fate, and Beauty, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus has enough. To the Genealogie, he adds Elius, or the Sun, as father of Uranus, and among the children of Uranus, Japetus, Betulus, and Dagon (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giving withall to Uranus, the proper name of Terrenus, or Indigena, and of Ilus to Saturn, but omitting Jupiter of Crete.

The Pedigree of them is this:

§. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones; whereof some say, some affected, the name of God.

OF Jupiter Belus, the Son of Saturnus Babylonicus, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three, by him remembered: for long after these times were the Greeks but Salvages, if they seek no farther off for their gods.

But the Egyptians, even after the Flood, began (somewhat before this Chaldean Jupiter) to entitle Cham, the Parent of their own Misraim, Jupiter Chammon, or Hammon. For the Etymologie of this word (Hammon) which the Greeks deduce ab aremis, from the sands, is ridiculous (saith Pencer); neither yet is his own much better, who brings it from Hamath, which signifieth Heat: because the Temple of Jupiter Hammon was seated in Libya, where the ayr is exceeding hot and scorching. And as for the Antiquity of the latter Jupiter (among the Greeks and Romans the most renowned) it is certain, that he was born not long before the War of Troy, as by many of his Sons is made manifest: namely, Castor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which lived in that Age of Priamus, under whom, and with whom, Troy was destroyed.

Now, seeing that mortal men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortal among the Heathens; it was not to be wondered at, that Alexander, Macedon, Tiberius, Nero, Caligula, and others, sought to be numbered among them, who were as deformed Monsters as the rest: for by what reason could the same Deity be denied unto Laurentia and Flora, which was given to Venus? seeing they were as notorious and famous Harlots, as she was.

§. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathens had far better opinions of God.

BUT that ever Pythagoras or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, believed in any of these fooleries, is cannot be suspected, though some of them (over-busily) have mixed their own inventions with the Scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiod in Hell, where he famed that they were perpetually stung and pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read over all the Books of Moses, as by places stolen thence, almost word for word, may appear; of which Justine Martyr remembereth many in that Treatise converted by Mirandula. As for Plato, though he dissembled in some things for fear of the Inquisition of the Areopagites, yet S. Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembered) Et mirificè in delectatur est, quæ de uno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Justine Martyr. Now, howsoever Laërtius pleased to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledge, from the Egyptians, and the Chaldeans, neglecting the Jews, and Books of Moses; * Eusebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, find reason to believe the contrary, thinking that from thence he took the grounds of all by him written of God, or favouring of Divinity: and the same opinion had S. Ambrose of Pythagoras.

But whether it were out of the same vanity, which possessed all those learned Philosophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not under the right Authors names) those things which he had read in the Scriptures; or fearing the severity of the Areopagites, and the example of his Master Socrates, by them put to death by poison; I cannot judge. Justine Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to Plato's fear, whose words among many other of the same effect, are these: Plato, Mosis mentionem facere, ob id, quod unum solumque Deum docuerat, sibi apud Athenienses tutum non putavit, verius Areopagum; Plato, fearing the Areopagites, thought it not safe for him among the Athenians, to make mention of Moses, that he taught there is but one God. But for that Divinity which he hath written in Timæo, Id ipsum de Deo diffinit quod & Moses; He discoursed and taught the same of God (saith Justine Martyr) which Moses did. For, where it pleased God by his Angel to answer Moses, Ego sum existens, (which is) I Am; and, Existens mihi me ad vos; I am hath sent me unto you; herein did Plato (saith Justine Martyr) no otherwise differ than that Moses used the word (qui) and Plato the word quod: Moses enim, qui existit (inquit); Plato, quod existit for Moses saith, He who is; Plato, That which is. Now, of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficulty either to conceive, or express the same, he giveth this testimony: Genitorem Universitatis tam difficile est invenire, quam inventum impossibile dignè profari; It is as hard to find out the Creator of the Universal, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speak of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Majesty of Gods Nature, than this property by Plato acknowledged? Deus

n. 10.

Lactantius.

bonus, & quidem Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is evil, he is no cause at all. And again, Charitas Dei fuit causa salutis mundi; & origo omnium rerum; The love of God was the cause of the world's creating, and the original of all things. Apuleius the Platonist; Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci exsolatione, sed etiam nature dignitate; & nihil est Deo simile & gratius, quam vir animo perfecto bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not only by exclusion of place, but by the dignity of nature: neither is there any thing more like, or more acceptable to God, than a Man of a perfect heart. Thales affirmeth, that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: Quia nunquam esse cepit, because he never had any beginning, zono, that God beheld even the thoughts of men; Athenodorus says, that therefore all men ought to be careful in the actions of their life, because God was every where present, and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses story of the Creation, than this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Enripide, Scholar of Anaxagoras?

Celum terraque unus forme fuit:
Sed cum fuissent abjuncta complexu mutuo,
Emergit omnis in lucem res progenita;
Arbores, aves, feræ, quæque affert mare,
Genusque mortalium.

Heaven and Earth one form did bear:
But when dis-join'd once they were
From mutual embraces,
All things to light appeared then;
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still-remaining races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato; so we find the same excellent understanding in Orpheus, who every where expressed the infinite and sole power of one God; though he use the name of Jupiter, thereby to avoid the error and danger of the time: but that he could attribute those things to the Sons of men, and mortal creature, which he doth to this Jupiter, there is no man, who hath ever heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith Mirandula) quos Orpheus canit, non decipitium Demonum, à quibus malum & non bonum provenit; sed naturalium virtutum divinarumque sunt nomina. The names of these gods whom Orpheus doth sing, are not of deceiving Devils, from whom evil comes, and not goodness; but they are the names of natural and divine Vertues. Yea, that he reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himself, this his instruction to Museus, and the Hymn following, teach us: Respicimus verò ad divinum hunc sermonem, et diligenter animam adverte, intendens coram rationis capax conceptaculum, ut rem autem assequens viam, & solum aspicere mundi regem. Unus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt; ipse versò in illis versatur, nec quisquam eum intueri possit mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truly lend Thy heart, that's reasons sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one,
Begotten of himself, from whom is born alone
All else; in which he's still: nor could it ere befall
A mortal eye to see him once, yet he sees all.

And again the same Authour,

Jupiter omnipotens, et primus, et ultimus, ideus, Jupiter est caput & medius: Iovis omnia munia, Jupiter est fundamentum, & stellantis Olympi.
Jupiter & mater est, & semina æthere, meritis spiritus est cunctis, valde vis: Jupiter æthere, Et pelagi radice, Sol, Luna est Jupiter ipse.
Rex & origo simul rerum est, & seminis ideus.
Nam prius occuluit, æquæque præcipue sacrum, Cor repleans, bene in dulcis dedit omnia locum.

The first of all is God; and the time last is he;
God is the head and midst; yea from him all things be,
God is the base of Earth, and of the starred sky.
He is the Male and Female too; that never die.
The Spirit of air is God; the Sun and Moon, and what is higher.
The King the original of all, of all the end.
For close in holy breast he did all comprehend, Whence all the blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

Now (besides these former testimonies) that all the learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Grecians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions; and leave the Readers to those large and learned Collections of Justine Martyr, Clement, Lactantius, Eusebius, Eugubinus, Pencer, Plessin, Danæus, and others, for Cleuther the Starch, being demanded of

of what nature God was, described him by these Attributes and properties: Donus, justus, sanctus, scriptum possident, militi, speciosus, optimus, severus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, gloriosus, charitas, &c. Good, just, holy, possessing himself, profitable, best, severe, free, always doing good, safe without fear, glorious, and self-charity. Epicharmus affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced every Nature, was only and every where powerful: agreeing with Democritus: Rex omnium ipse solus; He is the only King of kings; and with Pinclarus the Poet, Deus unus, pater, creator summus atque optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diversas secundum merita prebet; One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best artificer, who giveth to every thing divers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith Antisthenes) cannot be resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere known; Nisi in patria illa perennis, cæcis imaginem nullam habes: Save only in that everlasting Country, whose image thou hast none at all. Hereof also Xenophanes Colophonius: Unus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore nec mente mortalibus similis; There is one God among gods and men most powerful, neither corporally nor mentally like unto mortals: and Xenophon, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potensque, quod omnibus patet: quævis autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsi soli, qui luce (sua omnia perlustrat): God who shaketh all things, and severeth all things at rest, is great and mighty; as it is manifest to all: but of what Form he is, it is manifest to none, save only to himself, who illuminateth all things with his own light. Finally, Plato saith, Totius rerum natura causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, æternus animantium subsistator, assiduus mundi sui opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neque loco, neque tempore nili comprehensus, eoque paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the cause, ground, and original of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soul, the eternal preserver of living creatures, the continual framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceive him in thought, none can express what he is. Therefore was it said by Saint Hierom, Si enim cunctos Philosophorum revolvam libros, necesse est ut in eis reperias aliquam partem verborum Dei: ut, apud Platonem, fabricatorem mundi Deum: apud Zenonem, Stoicorum Principem, inferos & immortales animas, &c. If thou consider all the books of the Philosophers, thou canst not but find in them some part of the Vessels of God, as, in Plato, God the Creator of the world: in Zeno, Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal Souls, &c. And this is certain, that if we look into the wisdom of all Ages, we shall find that there never was man of solid understanding or excellent judgment; never any man whose mind the Art of education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are sober, and by a pensive inspection advised; but that he hath found by an irresistible necessity, one true God, and everlasting Being, all for ever causing, and all for ever sustaining; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reverence acknowledged, or more learnedly expressed, then that Egyptian Hermes, howsoever it failed afterward in his posterity: all being at length by devilish policy of the Egyptian Priests purposely obscured; who invented new gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the Devil perwaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keep in awe and order their common people.

S. VIII.

That Heathenism and Judaism, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

BUT these are again vanished: for the inventions of mortal men are no less mortal than themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a god, is crept into every mans chimney, which the lack of Fuel starveth, Water quencth, and want of Air suffocateth: Jupiter is no more vexed with Juno's Jealousies; Death hath perwaded him to chastity, and her to patience; and that time which hath devoured it self, hath also eaten up both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea their stately Temples of Stone and duresful Marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found upon the Earth, nor any Monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phœnicia that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Lycia, Creta, Theſſalia, or elsewhere, that can ask counsel or help from Jupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apollo's Priests are become speechless, and the trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Devils telling men's fortunes therein, is taken up by counterfeit Egyptians, and couzening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Devil gave way to these his overthrows and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chief mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repaired, and re-edified again, till by the hand of God himself it received the last and utter subversion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Enbaean Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians utterly sack'd: Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the son of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Army of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captains of the Phoenices: Sixthly, by Nero: who carried thence five hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein again set up at the common charge. But whatsoever was gathered between the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Army made spoil of, defacing as much as the time permitted them: notwithstanding all this, it was again gloriously re-built, and so remained till such time as Julian the Apostata sent thither to know the success of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was utterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heaven, and the Image of Apollo himself, and all the rest of the Idols therein, molten down, and lost in the Earth.

The like success had the Jews in the same Julian's time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem: for while they were busied to lay the foundations, their buildings were overthrown by an Earthquake, and many thousands of the Jews were overwhelmed with the ruins, and others slain and scattered by Tempest and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more favourably for the Jews, ascribing this to the nature of that Element. For, saith he, Allypius and the Ruler of the province of Judea, being by Julian busied in the re-edifying of this Temple, flaming Balls of fire issuing near the foundation, and oft consuming the Workmen, made the Enterprize frustrate.

Of the last refuges of the Devil to maintain his Kingdom.

Now the Devil, because he cannot play upon the open stage of this World, (as in those daies) and being still as industrious as ever, finds it more for his advantage to creep into the minds of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, works them to a more effectual adoration of himself then ever. For whereas he first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead Stones cut into faces of Beasts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now sets before them the high and shining Idol of glory, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. He tells them that truth is the Goddess of dangers and oppressions, that chastity is the enemy of Nature, and lastly, that as all virtue (in general) is without taste; so pleasure satisfieth and delighteth every sense: for true wisdom (saith he) is exercised in nothing else, then in the obtaining of power to oppress, and of riches to maintain plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-Politician find in his Pupils any remorse, any feeling or fear of God's future judgments, he perswades them that God hath so great need of men's Souls, that he will accept them at any time, and upon any condition: interrupting by his vigilant endeavours all offer of timeful return towards God, by laying those great blocks of rugged poverty and despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his divine presence. But as the mind of man hath two Ports, the one alwaies frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and over-grown with grass, by which enter our charitable thoughts and divine contemplations: so hath that of Death a double and twofold opening, worldly misery passing by the one, worldly prosperity by the other: at the entrance of the one we find our sufferings and patience to attend us; (all which have gone before us to prepare our joys) at the other our cruelties, covetousness, licentiousness, injustice, and oppressions (the harbingers of most fearful and terrible sorrow) staying for us. And as the Devil our most industrious enemy was ever most diligent: so he now more laborious then ever; the long day of Mankind drawing fast towards an evening, and the Worlds Tragedy and Time near at an end.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noah's Flood.

§. I.

Of Gods fore-warning: and some humane Testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noah's Flood.

OF this distruction it pleased God to give warning unto Noah: who (saith Josephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Decedens cum suis in aliam regionem migravit: He departed with his children, and travailed into another region. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himself, Berosus writeth in this manner; That they exceeded in all sorts of inhumane and unnatural wickedness, and that they were contemptors & religionists & deorum; contemptors of religion & of the gods: among which mighty men (saith Berosus) unus erat qui deorum venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. hinc nomen erat Noah: There was one more wise and reverencing the Gods: then the rest, whose name was Noah: who with his three Sons, Sem, Japheth, and Cham, and with their Wives, and the wife of Noah, (namely, Titea the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla) preserved themselves in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God said unto Noah, Make thee an Arke of Pines: thou shalt make cabins in the Arke, and shalt pitch it within and without with pitch. For God made Noah to know, that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graves of the rebellious and cruel Generations were already fashioned in the Clouds, which soon after should swallow up and cover all living creatures which breathed in the Ayr, Noah and his family excepted.

But this universal grave of Waters, and general Deluge hath not been received by all: for divine testimonies do not perswade all natural men to those things to which their own reason cannot reach: Dum obvoluta in obscuro veritas latet: Whilest the truth lieth wrapt in obscurity. Many there are who have disputed against the universality of this Overflowing, and have judged that this flood of Noah fell but in some particular places and Kingdoms: moved so to think, because in elder Ages there have been many other Floods (as they suppose) of that nature.

Hereof Nicolas Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by Josephus, *Jes. ant. Est super Minyadam excelsus Mons in Armenia, in quo c. 4. qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes sermo est diluvii tempore liberatores, & quoniam c. 4. dam simul in Arca decessum in hujus vertice habuisse, ignorumque reliquias nullo tempore conservatas, qui fortasse is fuit de quoctiam Moses Judaeorum legislator scribit: thus far this Author. There is (saith he) above Minyada (or the Country of Minya) an exceeding high Mountain in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many having fled thither, were saved in the time of the Deluge; and that one was carried in an Ark, and rested upon the top of the Mountain, whereon there remained a long time after certain pieces thereof; and this might be the same of which Moses the Lawgiver of the Jews makes mention. And of this opinion were the Talmudists (saith Amnius) that many Giants saved themselves upon Mount Sion.*

But Berosus (who, after Moses, was one of the most ancient, howsoever he hath been since deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the general Flood, taking from thence the beginning of his History in these words: Ante aquarum cladem famosam, qua universus perit orbis, &c. Before that famous destruction of Waters, by which the World universal perished: witnesseth withall, that Noah with his Wife Titea, and his three Sons with their Wives (in all eight persons) were only saved.

§. II.

Of the Flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Flood.

BUT from the vanity of the Greeks, the Corrupters of all truth (saith Lactantius), who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquity, came the error first of all: who therein flattering themselves also, sought to perswade the World that there was no Flood preceded the Flood of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in Æolia, or rather of Attica; and therefore (saith Rhodiginus) Ogygium id appellat Poete, tanquam pervetus dixerit ab Ogyge vultissimo: The Poets gave the name of Ogygia to things exceeding ancient, as of Ogyges the most ancient.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest that he lived but in Jacobs time (though Ensebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was born 67. years after him. There is also an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he fair later) as Rhodiginus in the ninth Book of his Antiquities remembereth: Sunt tamen qui in Ægypto regasse autumant hunc; unde sit Cadmus, qui in Græciam profectus Thebas condidit, & Eove jugulato sic nuncupatus; quoniam Syriorum lingua Eos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith he) who think that this Ogyges did reign in Ægypt, whereby he should be Cadmus, who travelling into Greece, built Thebes, so named of a Beef slain because in the Syrian Language, a Beef is called Thebe.

But this Flood of Ogyges fell in the year of the World, 3440. according to Ensebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint; and the Flood of Noah in the year 2242. after the same account: and so there came 1200. between these Floods; wanting but two, though herein Ensebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now, although the very year and time of this overflowing in Æolia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set down, but that there is a great difference among Writers; yet whosoever makes it most ancient, finds above 500. years difference between that and the general Flood.

For Paulus Orosius affirms that this tempest fell upon the Athenians; but 1040. years before Rome was built. Bucholzerus saith, it was 1043. elder than Rome; which was founded (according to the same Bucholzerus) in the worlds year, 3219. though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will give my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds year, 3280. Now, the general Flood preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzerus) 1563. years: and the Flood of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easy calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference between these two Floods must be 520. years, to which we (allowing 60. more) find 480. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah, Ogyges Prifius, as some do) it appears by this, that the Flood of Ogyges then King of Attica, or Ogygia, did not extend it self any further then the banks of Archi-pelago, or the Ægean Sea. For, whereas Mela, Pliny, and Solinus witness, that the City of Joppa in Judea was founded before the Flood; and that (notwithstanding the height of waters) there remained on certain Altars of Stone, the Title of the King, and of his Brother Phineus, with many of the grounds of their Religion: sure it is no where found among prophane Historians, nor in the Scriptures, that ever the Flood of Ogyges spread it self over any part of Syria, much less over all the Earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Æolia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were swallowed up (Cities seated on the North part of Peloponnesus): of which Ovid.

Si quæras Helicen, & Bura, Achaïas urbes, Invenies sub aquis.

Bura and Helice, on Achaian ground, Are sought in vain, but under Sea are found.

Of this Flood of Ogyges, was invented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Labea, the Daughter of Cæus, the Son of Titan, being beloved, and forced by Jupiter, and by him gotten with child, Juno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the Earth to be delivered out and whilom, caused the monstrous Serpent Python, to follow and affright her, wherefore she travelled, till at length arriving at the Isle of Ogygia, she was there received; in which she was delivered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins; whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his reign) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled such thick mists and fogs, that in Attica and along the coasts of the Ægean Sea, neither the beams of the Sun by day, nor of the Moon by night, could pierce the ayr, or be perceived by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the Earth being dried, and these vapours dissipated) the ayr began to be clear, the people of Orygia espied the light of the Moon somewhat before day, and in the same morning the Sun also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the Moon, and Apollo the Sun) they were reported to be born in the Isle of Orygia, thereof afterwards called Delos; which signifieth Manifestation.

And surely it is not improbable, that the Flood of Ogyges, being so great, as Histories have have reported it, was accompanied with malalteration of the ayr, sensibly discerned in those parts, and some unusual face of Skies. Varro in his Books, de gente populi Romani (as he is cited by S. Augustine) reports out of Cæsar, that so great a miracle hapned in the Star of Venus, as never was seen before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatness, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out, as Adrastus Cyzicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians affirmed, in the time of Ogyges.

Now, concerning the course of that, or any other Planet, I do not remember, that I have any were read of so good Astrologers, flourishing among the Greeks, or elsewhere in those days, as were likely to make any calculation of the revolutions of the Planets, so exact that it should need no reformation: Of the colour and magnitudes I see no reason, why the difference found in the Star of Venus, should be held miraculous; considering, that lesser mists and fogs than those which covered Greece with so long darkness, do familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the Sun and Moon. That the figure should vary, questionless it was very strange; yet I cannot hold it any prodigious: for it stands well with good reason, that the face of Venus which the Sun beholds, being enlightened by him, the opposite half should remain shadowed; whereby that Planet would, unto our eyes, decry one way that part whereon the light falleth, appear to be burned, at the Moon doth seem; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

A worthy Astrologer now living, who by the help of perspective Glasses, hath found in the Stars many things unknown to the Ancients, affirmeth so much to have been discovered in Venus, by his late observations. Whether some wary disposition of the ayr might represent as much to them that lived with Ogyges, as Cælianus hath seen through his instrument; I cannot tell: sure I am, that the discovery of a truth formerly unknown, doth rather convince Man of ignorance, than Nature of error: One thing herein is worthy to be noted; that this great, but particular Flood of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of S. Augustine) accompanied with such unusual (and therefore the more dreadfully, though natural) signs, testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Flood of Noah, which was general, and altogether miraculous, may seem to have had no other token, or foreboding, than the long preaching of Noah himself, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Flood came suddenly, and took them all away.

§. III.

Of Deucalions Flood: and that this was not Noahs Flood: nor the Umbri in Italy, a remnant of any universal Flood.

A Second Flood of great fame, and of which the time is more certain, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia; of which S. Augustine out of Varro: His temporibus (ut Varro scribit) regnante Athenienfibus Cranao, successore Cecropis (ut autem nostri, Eusebius & Hieronymus) adhuc eodem Cecrope permanente, Diluvium fuit, quod appellatum est Deucalionis: (that is) In these times, (as Varro reporteth) Cranaus the successor of Cecrops governed the Athenians, or, (as our Eusebius and Hierome say) Cecrops yet living, that Flood (called Deucalions) hapned.

And in the beginning of the 11. Chapter of the said 18. Book, he useth these words: Eduxit ergo Moyses ex Ægypto populum Dei novissimo tempore Cecropis Athenienfium Regis, cum apud Asyrios regnaret Alcatades, apud Sicyonios Marathus, apud Argivos Tripas: Moyses led the people of God out of Ægypt about the latter time of Cecrops, King of the Athenians, Alcatades reigning over the Asyrians, over the Sicyonians Marathus, and over the Argives Tripas. So as leaving the curiosity of a few years more or less, it appeareth, that this Flood of Deucalion was either at the egression of the children of Israhel out of Ægypt, or near it: and then after Noah 739. years; according to Fundinus, who makes Cecrops to live in the year of the World, 2400. or if we follow Mercator, then 739. years after Noah, and in the year of the World 2395. But if Deucalion were born in the age of the World 2356. according to Codoman; then giving unto Deucalion 40. years of age when this Flood hapned, it falleth within one year of Mercator's account. But Deucalion, by all approved Historians, is said to have been 82. years old at that time. Now, Clement, Alexandrinus dates the time of this Flood, of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaëton's time, by the Reign of Crotopus, King of the Argives; but Crotopus lived King of the Argives six years after Israhel departed Ægypt, which makes twenty years difference, according to Fundinus, who will have this Flood and Burning to have fallen 14. years before Moses left Ægypt: for he gave of the Worlds years to the Flood and Burning, the year 2440. and to Moses egression the year 2454. And yet Cædricus thinks thinks that Moses was more ancient, and lived with Noah; but that cannot be true: for then had the Flood of Deucalion, and the Burning of Phaeton preceded the Flood of Ogyges, which is denied by all: for that of Thesfaly (called Deucalion) followed that of Atlica (called Ogygia) at least 250. years, or thereabouts. Ensebius in his Chronologie, makes it 230. and so doth P. Orosius: Ensebius about the 50. year of Moses life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noahs Flood 770. years: for these be Clemens Alexandrinus his words: Fuit autem in Grecia tempore quidem Phornei, qui fuit post Inachum, inundatio que fuit tempore Ogygis: There happened in Greece, in the time of Phorneus, who lived after Inachus, the Flood of Ogyges. Now, if the Flood of Ogyges in Atlica were 1020. or 1016. years before the first Olympiad, according to Ensebius and Orosius (as before); then it is manifest, that taking 762. out of this number of 1020. it falls out, that Ogyges Flood happened before the Hebrews left Egypt 250. years, or 260. years, according to the difference between the opinions of Ensebius and Orosius. And for my self (who rather follow those Chronologers, which give 60. years more to Abraham after the Flood, than the rest) I reckon the times which come between these Floods in this sort. The general Flood was in the year of the World 1656. Jacob was born in the year of the World 2169. so as from the beginning of the Flood to Jacob's birth, there were consumed 513. years. Ogyges Flood happened 100. years after Jacob was born; and therefore after the general Flood 613. years. Now, Deucalion was born in the year of the World 2356. and had lived 82. years, when his kingdom of Thesfaly was overwhelmed; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his flood was after Noahs Flood ended, 782. years. And hereto Annius his Xenophon agreeeth, who makes 700. years between the general Flood and Deucalion's birth; to which added 82. years of his Age (as before) and then the Flood of Thesfaly followed the general 782. years. The words of that Xenophon are these: *Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum Deucalionis, secundum anno Spheri, septingenti supputantur anni, qui natus annos duos & octoginta Thesfaliam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of Deucalion, in the second year of Spharus, are numbered 700. years, and when Deucalion was 82. years old, he saw Thesfaly drowned. This Flood hapned in the Winter time about Parnassus: witness Aristotle, in the first of his Meteors. And Varro (whom S. Angustine so often citeth for his excellent Learning, especially in* Antiquities) findeth this flood of Deucalion to have hapned in the time of Cranaus, who succeeded Cecrops: Orosius thinks it somewhat later, Amphitryon reigning in Athenis, the third from Cecrops: Only this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not only over Thesfaly it self, and the Regions adjoining Westward, but it covered the greatest part of Italy: and either the same, or some other particular flood then hapning, oppressed Egypt, saith Ensebius. And therefore did the Greeks either think it, or feign it to be universal; and Deucalion the King, saving himself, and some others on the Mountain of Thesfaly (of all other the highest, saith Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) said to be the preserver of man-kind. That this flood covered a great part of Italy, Pliny, and Solinus make it probable, who affirm, that the people then inhabiting Italy, were therefore called Ouleni: quia ab imbribus diluvii superfluent; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Book, and Trexantius in his second: which Umbri these Authors make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Brucii, and all other inhabiting anciently the banks of the Mediterrane Sea: But that these Umbri were not the Inhabitants of Italy before the Flood of Noah, and so took name by saving themselves upon the Appennine Mountains, the Scriptures teach us, shewing who, & who only then were preserved, which is sufficient. Report hath adventured further, telling us, that the first people which after the general Flood inhabited Italy, were the Camefenses: (so named from Camefe, whom Cato in Originibus, another of Annius his Authors, names for a consort of Janus) which people lived altogether a savage life; till such time as Saturn arriving on those Coasts, devised Laws to govern them by: the memory of whose Acts in that Region, Diodorus and Thallus among the Greeks; Nepos, Cassius, and Varro among the Latines, have preserved; and of whom Virgil:

Primus ab ethereo venit Saturnus Olympo, Arma Jovis fugiens, & regni exul adeptus;
It genus indocile, ac dispersum montibus altis
Compulsi, legesque dedit; Latineque vocari Maluit.

Saturn descending from the heavens high Fearing the Arms of Jupiter his Son, His Kingdom lost, and banisht thence,
doth fly,

Rude people on the Mountain tops he won
To live together, & by Laws; which done,
He chose to call it Latium.

And

And afterwards in the Verses following he speaketh of the Aufones; and after them, of the Sicani: Nations, which again fought to dis-plant the ancient Inhabitants:

Virg. l. 8. Tum manus Aufonia, & gentes venere Sicani.

Then came th' Aufonian Bands, and the Sicanian Tribes.

Of these Sicani (which left Spain, and late down in Italy) Thucydides and Pliny give testimony: who were again expelled by the Ligi, saith Thucydides. After all these Plantations and re-plantations, came the Umbri, descended of the Gahle (saith Annius) not of those Gauls of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italy, even all Hebrunia and Campania; as Herodotus, Pliny, and Dionysius have assured us: and therefore this Flood of Deucalion, was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italy, and dispossessed of Italy again, before the Umbri were ever heard of, or had being. So that Kingdom was first called Campense, then Latium or Saturnia, then Aufonia, then Sicania; before the Umbri (in whose time Deucalion's Flood happened) possessed the same, about 306. years before the War of Trois: Lycan then governing Arcadia: who being the Father of two and twenty Sons, the youngest called Oenotrus invaded Italy, who gave it the name of Oenotria. This name it held until Italus of the same Nation changed it into Italy, after his own name, about 250. years before the fall of Troy. After these, came the Pelagi, of whom Pliny in his third Book and fifth Chapter, and Strabo in his fifth; Thucydides in his sixth, speak at large: and after them the Ligi, under Tyrrhenus their Captain, that gave name to the Tyrrheni; who casting thence the Umbri, took from them three hundred Castles, and built therein twelve Cities; to which (after they had possessed and past over the Appennine Mountains) they added divers others, whereof Telsina (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not antiently such a Nation as these Umbri in those parts, I do not affirm; having respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinks, that the name was derived from the Greek word Ombros; but that these Umbri of Italy were descended of the Nation of Scythians (called Galli) it shall be shewed hereafter.

Of some other Records testifying the universal Flood: and of two antient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

Saint Angustine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greeks and Latines made no any mention of the Universal Flood; because they had nothing of Antiquity foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus, before remembered) were all things among the Greeks (which antiquity had worn out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in English commonly call (worm-eaten, or) of defaced date. But as all the parts of the Earth were successively planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did every Family, which afterward became a great people, with whom the knowledge of divine Letters was not received, find no Parent of more antiquity, then such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their own; and as the Grecians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigene, and growing out of the Earth, or invent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certain knowledge of Noahs Flood, as Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolas Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirm by hear-say, that some Giants saved themselves upon the Mountain Bark in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authority approved; using the word Sermo est; That such a speech there was. And Ensebius remembereth a place out of the antient Historian Abydenus: who writeth that Sistibrus, to preserve himself from a Flood, fore-told him by Saturnus, fled to the Hills of Armenia by ship, ad Armeniam navigio confugit; who the third day (after the waters were fallen) sent forth Birds, that finding no Land to rest on, returned again; which he also did a second time; but at the third return, the Birds feet were covered with mud and slime. To this effect are Ensebius's words out of Abydenus, which may seem a true description (though in other terms) of Noahs Flood.

Cyrillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this general Flood. And Plato in Timaeo produceth an Egyptian Priest, who re-counted to Solon out of the holy Books of Egypt, the story of the Flood universal, which (saith he) happened long before the Grecian Inundations. Frier Annius his Xenophon remembereth a third Flood, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat differently.

we shall find the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this Ayr, as every where compasseth and imbraceth the Earth, which condensation is a conversion of Ayr into Water, a change familiar in those Elements; it will not seem strange to men of judgment, yea, but of ordinary understanding, that the Earth (God so pleasing) was covered over with Waters, without any new Creation.

Lastly; For the opinions of Gulielmus Tarsensis, and Aliacensis, to which I may add Berosus, and others, That such a conjunction there was, fore-shewing that destruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Cataractæ Celi, or Windows of Heaven, was meant this conjunction; there needs no other answer than that observation of Ludovicus Vives, who affirmeth, That by the gravest Astrologian it was observed, that in the year 1524, there should happen the like conjunction as at Noah's Flood; than which (saith he) there was never a more fair, dry, and seasonable year: The like destruction was prophesied of the year 1588. But Picus Earl of Mirandula proveth, that there could not be any such conjunction at that time.

To conclude, I find no other myserie in the word Cataractæ Celi, than that the clouds were meant thereby: Moses using the word Windows of Heaven (if that be the sense of the word) to exprels the violence of the Rains, and pouring down of Waters. For whosoever hath seen those fallings of Water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spouts, (where clouds do not break into drops, but fall with a resistless violence in one body) may properly use that manner of speech which Moses did; That the Windows, or Flood-gates of Heaven opened: (which is) That Waters fell contrary to custom, and that order which we call natural. God then loosened the power retentive in the uppermost ayr, and the Waters fell in abundance: Behold (says Job) he withholdeth the Waters, and they dry up (or better in Latine, Et omnia secantur: And all things are dried up) but when he sendeth them not, they destroy the Earth: And in the 26 Chapter: He bindeth the waters in the clouds. But these Bonds God loosed at that time of the general Flood, and called up the Waters which slept in the great Deep; and these joyning together, covered the Earth, till they performed the work of his will: which done, he then commanded them to return into their dark and vast Caves; and the rest (by a Wind) rarified again into ayr, formerly condensed into drops.

Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

Noah, commanded by God, before the fall of those Waters, entered the Ark which he had built, with his own Wife, and his Sons, and his Sons Wives, taking with them of every Creature which took life by generation, seven of the clean, and of the unclean, two. Noah, according to Philo, signifieth Quietness: after others, and according to the Prophecie of his Father Lamech, Celsation; to whom aftertimes gave many Names, answering his Antiquity, Zeal, Virtue, and other qualities: as, The first Ogges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogges, there was also a great Flood of Archaia: Satur they called him, because he was the Father of Nations: Others gave him the Name of Prometheus, who was said to steal away Jupiter's fire; Fire in that place being taken and understood for the knowledge of God and heavenly things. Others think, that he was so called for his excellent wisdom and foresight. He had also the Name of Jannus, (id est) Vinosus, because Jain signifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian finds him written in libris Ritualibus, in the books of Ceremonies, preceding both Satur, Uranus, and Jove: which three enjoyed an elder time then all the other ancientest feigned gods. And this Name Jain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine for it was in use before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdom by that Name known. Of the antiquity of Jannus, Fabius Pictor giveth this testimony: Jani astate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus postoribus nondum hæserat ulla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & Ear primus populus docuit Jannus ad sacrificia: primus enim Aras & Pomaria & Sacra docuit: In the time of Jannus (saith he) there was no Monarchy: for the desire of rule had not then folded it self about the hearts of men. Jannus first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Idols: he first set up Altars, instituted Gardens, and solitary Groves, wherein they used to pray; with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater testimony than this there cannot be found among all the Heathen, which in all agree so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilst Noah flourished, there was not any King, or Monarch; Nimrod being the first that took on him sovereign Authority. Secondly, Noah, after the Flood, was the first that planted the Vine, and became an Husband-man; and therefore offered the first-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and of the History of the World.

and Meal. Thirdly, he was the first that raised an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God a thanksgiving for his merciful goodness towards him. Noah was also signified in the Name of Bifrons (which was given to Jannus) because he beheld the times both before and after the Flood. Quia præterita novit, & futura præseperit, saith Arnobius: Beatus he quæ nōn erat, præstavit, et præstavit quæ nōn erat. He was also in the person of Jannus shadowed by the Name of Chaos, and Semen Orbis, The seed of the World: because, as out of that confused Heap was drawn all the kinds of Beasts and Plants; so from Noah came all Mankind. Whercof Ovid in the person of Jannus:

Chaos antiqui (nam sum res præca) vocabant: Aplice quàm longè temporis astra cano!

The Antient call'd me Chaos: my great years
By those old times, of which I sing, appear.

He was also intituled Caelum and Sol, Heaven and the sun, for his excellent knowledge in Astronomy: Vermunus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diad. Siculus and Alex. Aphrodisiens so call, because he was the restorer of the Greeks to their former liberty, but in respect of the Flood. For the Greeks called Liber Ja, and his Nurses Hyades, of Rain, because Noah entered the Ark when the Sun joynd with the Stars Hyades, a constellation in the Brow or Neck of Taurus, and ever after a Monument of Noah's Flood. He was also by others surnamed Triton, a Marine god, the Son of Neptune; because he lived in safety on the Waters. So was he known by the name of Diostyris, quasi divitum, mentem pungen; Bite-brain, or Willing; though Diodorus conceive otherwise, and derive that name à Patre & Loco: of his Father and the place of his Birth, (to wit) of Jove, and Nisa, a Town of Arabia Felix, saith Suidas, out of Orphens. He had also the by-name of Taurus, or Taurorhagus; because he first yoked Oxen, and Tilled the ground: according to that of Moses; and Noah became an Husband-man. Now howsoever the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus, (otherwise Dionysus) it is certain, that the Name was borrowed, and the Invention stolen from Noah. But this name of Bacchus, more attently Bokenus, was taken (saith Gul. Stuckius, and out of him Danerus) from Noachus, (N) being changed into (B); and it is the more probable, because it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the Vine after the Flood: and of Noah (the first and ancient Bacchus) were all those fables devised, of which Diodorus complaineth in his fourth Book and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was surnamed Nysus, of the Mountain Nysa in India; where the Grecian Bacchus never came, whatsoever themselves feign of his enterprises: and these Mountains of Nysa joyne with those of Paropamisus, and those other Eastern Mountains, on which the Ark of Noah rested after the Flood.

Furthermore, to the end that the memory of this second Parent of Mankind might the better be preserved, there were fought by his issues many great Cities, which bear his Name, with many Rivers and Mountains; which oftentimes forgot that it was done in his regard, because the many Names given him, brought the same confusion to places as to himself. Notwithstanding all which, we find the City of Noah upon the banks of the red Sea, and elsewhere: the River of Noah in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolemy, Dannus; dividing Illyria from Pannonia. Thus much for the Name.

§. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Ark: as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion, and name.

Now in what part of the World Noah built the Ark, it doth not appear in the Scriptures, neither do I find any approved Author that hath written thereof; only Goropius Becanus in his Indo-Syrcia conceiveth, that Noah built his Ark near the Mountains of Caucasus, because on those hills are found the goodliest Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the war among the people, called Nysæi, inhabiting the other side of Caucasus, he found all their Burials and Sepulchres wrought over with Cedar. To this place (saith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to separate himself from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled against God and Nature, as also because he would not be interrupted in the building of the Ark; to which also he addeth the conveniency of Rivers, to transport the Timber which he used, without troubling any other Carriages.

Only this we are sure of, that the Ark was built in some part of the Eastern World; and to my understanding, not far from the place where it rested after the Flood. For Noah did not use any Mast or Sayle (as in other Ships) and therefore did the Ark no otherwise move, than the Hulk or body of a Ship doth in a calm Sea. Also, because it is not probable, that during these continual and down-right Rains, there were any Winds at all, therefore was the Ark little moved from the place where it was fashioned and set together: for it is written, God made a Wind to pass upon the Earth, and the Waters ceased. And therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storm or forcible wind at all, which could drive the Ark any great distance from the place where it was first by the Waters lifted up. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Ark had fundum planum; A flat bottom, and not rayed in form of a Ship, with a sharpness forward, to cut the Waves for the better speed.

This kind of Vessel the Hebrews call Thebet, and the Greeks Larnax, for they termed Dencalions Ship: and some say, that the Hill Parnassus, to which in eight days he arrived, was first called Parnassus; and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnassus; but Pansias thinks that it took name of a Son of the Nymph Cleodora, called Parnassus, the Inventor of Auguration.

Pencurus finds the word (Parnassus) to have no affinity with the Greek, but thinks it derived from the Hebrew word Nabas, which signifieth Auguration and Divination; or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles, in the Leaf before cited.

Josephus calls the Ark, Machina, by the general name of a huge Frame; and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew, Aron: but herein lieth the difference between Aron and Thebet, That Aron signifieth properly the Ark of the Sanctuary, but Thebet such a Vessel, as swimmeth, and beareth it self upon the Waters.

Lastly, this Ark of Noah differed from the fashion of a Ship, in this, that it had a Cover and Roofs, with a Crest in the midst thereof, and the sides declining like the Roof of an House; to the end, both to cast off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himself and his children might shelter; and Gen. 6. 4. separate themselves from the noyfulness of the many Beasts, which filled the other rooms and parts of the Ark.

Of what Wood the Ark was built, it is uncertain. The Hebrew word Gopher once, and in this place only used, is diversely understood: and though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneva Translation call it Pine-tree; the Rabbinic, Cedar; the Seventy, square Timber; the Latine, smooth Timber. Others will have it Cypress Trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypress is worn at Funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher signifie any special kind of Timber, Noah obeyed

the voice of God therein; If not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, having the promise of God, and his Grace and mercy for his defence: For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant. Plinius affirmeth, that in Egypt it was the use to build Ships of Cedar, which the worms eat not; and he avoweth, that he saw in Utica, in the Temple of Apollo, Cedar beams, laid in the time of the foundation of the City, and that they were still found in his time, which was about 1188 years after: proving thereby, that this kind of wood was not subject to putrifying or mouldring in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carry, and of a sweet favour, lasting also better than any other wood, and because neer the place where the Ark rested, there are found great store of these Cedar trees, as also in all the Mountains of the East, besides those of Libanus; it is probable enough that the Ark might be of that wood: which hath, beside the other commodities, the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build Ships withal. Percyrus conceiveth, that the Ark had divers sorts of Timber, and that the bottom had of one sort, the deck and partition of another; all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in general. True it is, that Cedar will serve for all parts of a Ship, as well for the Body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction received from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Ark; and to pitch it, and to divide it into Cabins; thereby to sever the clean Beasts from the unclean, and to preserve their several sorts of Food; and that it might be capable of all kind of living creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, he cast his confidence wholly on God; who by his Angels steered this Ship without a Rudder, and directed it without the help of a Compass or the North star. The Pitch which Noah used, is by some supposed to have been a kind of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantity about the Vally of Sodom and Gomorrhah, now the dead Sea, or Alphates, and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India: and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sun, but by the Fire only, after the manner of hard Wax.

That the Ark was of sufficient capacity.

THE Ark, according to Gods commandment, had of length three hundred Cubits

Cubits, fifty of breadth, and thirty deep or high: by which proportion, it had six parts of length to one of breadth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. Augustine: Prædilectio figura est peregrinationis in hoc seculo Civitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesie que sit salua per lignum, in quo pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Jesus Christus: nam & mensura ipsa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinisque ejus significat corpus humanum, in ejus veritate ad homines prænuñciatus est venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (saith he) it is a Figure of the City of God travelling in this world as a stranger, (that is) of the Church, saved by the Tree, whereupon the Mediator between God and Man, the Man Jesus Christ did hang: for even the very measure of the length, height and breadth, answereth the shape of Mans body, in the truth whereof the coming of Christ was fore-told and performed.

By what kind of Cubit the Ark was measured, it hath been a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: The first kind of Cubit (called the common) containeth one foot and a half, measured from the sharp of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the Palm-Cubit) which taketh one handfull more than the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Persian Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three inches. The fourth is the sacred Cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar Cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly, there is a fifth Cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth six common Cubits. But of all these sorts, which were commonly measured by the vulgar Cubit, the alteration and diminution of mens measures hath made the difference. For as there is now a less proportion of bodies, so is the common Cubit from the sharp of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of less length than it was in elder times.

Saint Augustine, considering the many sorts of Beasts and Birds which the Ark held, with their food and water, was sometime of opinion, that the Ark had proportion after the Geometrical Cubit, which containeth almost six of the common: For, measuring the Ark by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacity of that Vessel built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the Ship of Ptolemy Philopater. But S. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his judgment as touching the Geometrical Cubit; and found, upon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a Body to preserve all sorts of Creatures, by God appointed to be reserved. For it was not needfull to take any kinds of Fishes into the Ark, because they were kept living (saith S. Augustine) in their own Element. Non fuit necesse conservare in Arca que possent in aquis vivere, non solum merula sicut Pisces, verum super-natantia, sicut multa aliter: It was not needfull to conserve those creature in the Ark, which could live in the Waters; and not onely Fishes which can live under water, but also those Fowls which sit and swim on them. And again, Terra, non aqua, maledicta; quia Adam non hujus, sed illius fructum vetulum comedit: It was the Earth, and not the Waters which God cursed; for of the forbidden fruit of the Earth and not of the Sea, did Adam eat. So, as S. Augustine gathereth hereupon (as aforesaid) that so huge a Frame needed not.

And if we look with the eyes of judgment hereunto, we shall find nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) have more of mischief and of ignorance, than of any reverend reason, found many impossibilities in this work of God. But it is manifest, and undoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seem differing, and of several kinds, were not then in verum natura. For those Beasts which are of mixt natures, either they were not in that age, or else it was not needfull to preserve them, seeing they might be generated again by others: as the Mules, the Hyens, and the like; the one begotten by Alies and Mares, and the other by Foxes and Wolves. And whereas by discovering of strange Lands, wherein there are found divers Beasts and Birds, differing in colour or stature from those of these Northern parts; it may be supposed by a superficial consideration, that all those which were red and pied skins, or feathers, are differing from those that are less painted, and wear plain russet or black; they are much mistaken that so think. And for mine own opinion, I find no difference, but only in magnitude, between the Cat of Europe, and the Ounce of India; and even those Dogs which are become wild in Hispaniola, with which the Spaniards used to devour the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolves, and begin to destroy the breed of their Cattel, and do also oftentimes tear asunder their own Children. The common Crow and Rook of India is full of red feathers in the drowned and low Islands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thrush hath his feathers mixt with black and carnation in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog-fish of England is the Shark of the South Ocean: For it colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then then were the Nigro's, which we call the Black-Moors; non animalia rationalia, not Men, but some kind of strange Beasts; and so the Giants of the South America should be of another kind, than the people of this part of the World. We also see it daily, that the natures of Fruits are changed by transplantation, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Climate. Crabs may be made good Fruit by often grafting; and the best Melons will change in a year or two to common Cowcumers, by being set in a barren soil. Therefore, taking the kinds precisely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced; the Ark after the measure of the common Cubit, was sufficiently capacious to contain of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we add but half a foot of measure to the common Cubit, which had a foot and a half of Giantly stature (and less allowance we cannot give to the difference between them and us) then did the Ark contain 600. foot in length, and 100. foot in breadth, and 60. foot in depth.

But first of all, to make it manifest that the Geometrical Cubit is not used in the Scripture, the stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the Bed of Og, King of Basán, had been nine Geometrical Cubits long, it had taken 54. Cubits of the common, which make 80. foot; and Goliath, who had the length of six Cubits and an handful, which makes nine foot and an handful (a proportion credible) if these Cubits had been Geometrical, then had been 54. foot in height, and upwards, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliath been nine foot long, and far weightier and bigger then all David's body, who carried it away.

Again, if the Geometrical Cubit had been used for a Measure in the Scripture, as many Commenters have observed, then had the Altar (appointed to contain five Cubits of length, five of breadth, and three of height) reached the length of 27. foot upright, and so must their Priests have ascended by steps or Ladders to have performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrary to Gods Commandment, given in these words: Thou shalt not go up with steps unto mine Altar, that thy shame be not discovered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubits high, which make four foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their Office. Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinary Cubit of one foot and a half, according to the measure of Giantly stature; which measure (doubtless) might give much the more capacity to the Ark; although it be also probable, that as the Men were, so were the horses whereon they rode, and all other Creatures of a correspondent size. And yet; (as I take it) though by this means there were not any whit the more room in the Ark, it were not hard to conceive, how all the distinct Species of Animals, whose lives cannot be preserved in the Waters, might according to their present quantities be contained in a Vessel of those dimensions which the Ark had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a half of our now usual measure: whence it followeth of necessity, that those large bodies which were in the days of Noah, might have room sufficient in the Ark, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of Creatures to be saved, (that is, seven of the clean, two of the unclean, with necessary food) might have place in the Ark, Butao hath very learnedly declared: the brief sum of whole discourse to that purpose, is this. The length of the Ark was three hundred Cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fifty Cubits, and the product by the height of thirty Cubits, sheweth the whole Capacity to have been 450000. Now, whereas the posts, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may seem to have taken up a great part of the hollow: the height of the roof, which (the perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500. cubical Cubes was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a Ship of such greatness we seek room for 89. distinct Species of Beasts, or (lest any should be omitted) for 100. several kinds, we shall easily find place both for them; and for the Birds, which in bigness are no way answerable to them; and for meat to sustain them all. For there are three sorts of Beasts, whose bodies are of a quantity best known; the Beef, the Sheep, and the Wolf: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to four Beesves, one Lion to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Of Beasts, some feed on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirty kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number onely three are clean, according to the Law of Moses, whereof seven of a kind entred into the Ark, namely, three couples for breed, and one odd one for sacrifice: the other eight and twenty kinds were taken by two of each kind, so that in all there were in the Ark one and twenty great Beasts

Beasts clean, and six and fifty unclean, estimable for largeness as ninety one Beesves; yet for a supplement (left perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued as an hundred and twenty Beesves. Of the lesser sort feeding on vegetables, were in the Ark six and twenty kinds, estimable, with good allowance for supply, as fourscore Sheep. Of those which devour flesh were two and thirty kinds, answerable to threescore and four Wolves. All these two hundred and eighty Beasts might be kept in one story or room of the Ark, in their several Cabins; their meat in a second: the Birds and their provision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his Family, and all their necessaries.

That the Ark rested upon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) between the East-Indies, and Scythia.

§. I.

A Præterition of some Questions left material: with a Note of the use of this Question to find out the Metropolis of Nations.

What time Noah took to build the Ark, I leave to others to dispute: but he received the Commandment from God an hundred years before the Waters fell; and had therefore choice of time, and leisure sufficient. As for the number of Decks and Partitions, which Origen divides into four, Saint Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controversy: or, whether those Creatures which sometimes rest on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alegartos) the Sea-Cows, or Sea-Horses, were kept in the Ark, or no, I think it a needless curiosity; and yet to this faith Pererius, and others before him, that a Fish-boat might be made as well within the Ark, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disprove the foolery of the Hebrews, who suppose that the Ark was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windows of Crystal to receive in Light, and keep out Water, were but to revive the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seek most to satisfy my self and others in, is, In what part of the World the Ark rested after the Flood: because the true understanding of some of these places (as the seat of the terrestrial Paradise, and the resting of the Ark) do onely and truly teach the Worlds Plantation, and after the beginning of Nations, before and after the Flood; and all Story, as well general as particular, thereby may be the better understood.

§. II.

A Proposal of the common opinion, that the Ark rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

And first, for the true place where the Ark rested after the Flood, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah travelled to their first settlement and plantation, I am resolved (without any presumption) that therein the most Writers were utterly mistaken. And I am not led to think out of any Humour, or newness of opinion, or singularity; but do herein ground my self on the original and first truth, which is the word of God, and after that upon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, That the Ark stayed upon one of the mountains of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphrast hath converted Kardu, meaning the hills Gordei, or Gordiei, in Armenia the greater (as the words Gordei, and Kardu, seem to be one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are: I find neither Scripture nor Reason which teacheth any such thing (towit) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damascenus calls this Mountain of Ararat, Baris; being the same which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which Mountain the Frier Annius (citing this place out of Josephus) makes him find another adjoining, called Ocila, and to say that the Ark (of which Moses the Law-giver of the Hebrews wrote) did first take ground on this Ocila. But I do not find any such Mountain in being, as this Ocila, neither is there any mention of it in the place of Josephus. Strabo remembereth a Promontory in Arabia Felix of that name; and Pliny finds a Mart-town so called in the same, which Ptolemy calls Ocila, Pinetus Acyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damascenus, or rather of Annius, seemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian Mountains. Berosus calleth those Mountains of Armenia Gordiei, and Curtius Cordæi: Ptolemy Gordæi and Gordæi: of which the Country next adjoining is, by this Nicolaus Damascenus, called Nymia, perhaps (as Becanus conjectures) for Atlyad, or rather Minni: which word is used for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seems to be compounded of this word Atlyad, and Ar: as if we should say Atlyad Ar.

Not. Hist.

of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Pliny witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Cardies about these Mountains, whom others call Gordieni or Gordeni. The Mountains are seated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the Mountains called Taurus, or Niphates, in the Plains of Armenia the great, near the Lake Thospitis: whence the River of Tygris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. & 52. degrees of latitude. One of the Mountains, Gordiei (that which surmounteth the rest) Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Josephus. Which name (saith Junius) was of the event, because of Noahs coming down with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed event; seeing any Hill from whence on every side we must descend, may thus be called: as Junius corrects the place in Josephus Antiquities (Kubark). That the place is thus to be read, he conjectureth, because Joseph. l. 1. c. 4. says, the place is called Amatayov (as it were the descent or coming down) and Epiphanius lib. 1. contr. Heref. calls it Amat, which word in the Armenian and Egyptian Tongue signifieth Descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubar is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latine Delubrum may seem to be derived; and Ant. 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Egyptians are called Libertini, for Lubar tenu. Yet this opinion hath been embraced from Age to Age, receiving a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any further examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be given, especially to that Mountain, by reason that the passage was more fair, up and down unto it, than to any of the rest adjoining.

III.

The first Argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so near a place as Armenia.

But there are many Arguments to persuade me, that the Ark of Noah did not rest itself in any part of Armenia, and that the Mountain Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordiean Mountains.

For the first: It is agreed by all who follow Eusebius, that it was in the year 120. or in the year 131. after the Flood, when Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinar, which Valley was afterward call'd Babylonia, Chus, and Chaldea. If then the Ark had first found

Land in Armenia, it is very unprobable, that the children of Noah, which came into that Valley, could have spent so many years in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was only interjacent, which might by ease journeys have been past over in twenty days; and to hasten and help which passage, the navigable River of Tygris offered itself, which is every where transpassable by Boats of great burthen: so as where the Defart on the one side resisted their expedition, the River on the contrary side served to advance it; the River rising out of the same Ledge of Mountains, or at the foot of them, where the Ark of Noah was first supposed to settle itself. Then, if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surprise of a second Flood (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrews) it foundeth ill to the ear of reason, that they would have spent many years in that low and overflown Valley of Mesopotamia, so called, of the many Rivers which imbroider or compass it: for the effects witnesseth their affections, and the works which they undertook, their unbelief; being no sooner arrived in Shinar, but they began to provide themselves of a defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared inundation. Now, at Babel it was, that Nimrod began his Kingdom, the first known City of the World, founded after the Flood, about 131. years, or (as others suppose) ten years later: though (for my self) I rather think that they undertook that work in two respects; first, to make themselves famous, To get us a name (saith the Text); Secondly, thereby to usurp dominion over the rest.

IV.

The second Argument; That the Eastern People were most ancient in populosity, and in all humane glory.

For a second Argument: The civility, magnificence, and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the World first abounded) hath more weight than any thing which hath been, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noah's taking Land there. And that this is true, the use of Printing and Artillery (among many other things which the East hath) may easily persuade us, that those Sun-dring Nations were the most ancient. The certainty of this report, that the East-Indians (time out of mind) have had Guns and Ordnance of battery, confirmed by the Portugals and others, make us now to understand, That the place of Philoftratus in vita Apollonii lonii Trianai, l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though expressed in fabulous words: when he saith, that the wife men, which dwell between Euphratis and Ganges, use not themselves to go forth into Battel: but that they drive away their Enemies with Thunder and Lightning sent from Jupiter. By which means there it is said, that Hercules Egyptianus and Bacchus, joining their forces, were defeated there; and that this Hercules there cast away his golden Shield. For the invention of Letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because he brought them first into Greece: of which the people (then rude and savage) had reason to give him the honour, from whom they received the benefit. But it is true, that Letters are no less antient then Seth or Henoah were: for, they are said to have written on Pillars of Stone (as before remembred) long before the Flood. But from the Eastern world it was that John Gutenberg a German, brought the device of Printing: by whom Conradus being instructed, brought the practice thereof to Rome: and after that Nicolaus Gersan a Frenchman, bettered both the Letters and Invention. And not with standing that this Mytery was then supposed to be but newly born, the Chinois had Letters long before either the Egyptians or Pheicians; and also the Art of Printing, which as the Greeks had: neither any civil knowledge, or any Letters among them.

And, that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards have witnessed, who about an hundred years since discovered those Kingdoms; and do now enjoy their rich trades therein: for the Chinois account all other nations but salvages in respect of themselves.

And to add strength to this argument, the conquest and story of Alex. Macedon may justly be called to witness, who found more Cities and sumptuosity in that little Kingdom of Porus, which lay side by side to the East India, then in all his other travails and undertakings. For in Alexander's time, Learning and greatness had not travelled so far to the West as Rome. Alexander esteeming of Italy but as a barbarous Country, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that stood in his eye; and the fame of the East pierced his ears. And if we look as far as the Sun-rising, and hear Paulus Venetus what he reporteth of the uttermost Angle and Island thereof, we shall find that those Nations have sent out, and not received; lent knowledge, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more civil; the farther West, the more Salvage. And of the Ile of Japan (now Zi- pingari) Venetis maketh this report: Incole religionis, literis, & sapientia sunt addidissimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) facris in delubris exercent: num cognoscunt Principem, unum Deum adorant: The Islanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and philosophy, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent then prayer, which they use in their Churches, after the manner of Christians: They acknowledge one King, and worship one God. The antiquity, magnificence, civility, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policie in government, is reported to be such by those who have been employed in those parts, as it seemeth to exceed (in those formerly named, and divers other particulars) all other Kingdoms of the World.

V.

The third Argument, from the wonderful resemblance which Semiramis found in the East Indies.

But for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the invasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and advised Reader: who may consider in what Age she lived, and how soon after the Worlds new birth she gathered her Army (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctesias reporteth) of more then three millions to invade India, to which he adjoynd also 500000. Horse, and 400000. Waggon: whereof if we believe but a third part, it shall suffice to prove that India was the first planted and peopled Country after the Flood. Now as touching the time wherein she lived: All Historians consent that she was the Wife of Ninus, and the most approved Writers agree, that Ninus was the Son of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Son of Chus, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came to Shinar, he was then a great Nation, as by the building of the City and Tower of Babel may appear; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents cast between Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Army was composed. Let us then see with whom she encountered in that War with this her powerful Army: even with a multitude, rather exceeding, then equalling her own, conducted by Staurabator King of India beyond Indus; of whose multitudes this is the witness of Diod. Siculus: Staurabates coactis majoribus, quam que erant Semiramidis, copiis: Staurabates gathering together greater Troops than those of Semiramis. If then these numbers of Indians had been increased but by a Colony sent out from Shinaar (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt took some time in the performance) this increase in the East, and this Army of Staurobates must have been made of stone, or somewhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might easily grow up in that time, from so great a Troop as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall be demonstrated hereafter in the Story of Sparta) so could not any such time, by any multiplication natural, produce so many bodies of men as were in the Indian Army victorious over Semiramis, if the Colonies sent thither had been so late as Babel overturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if we allow 65 years time after the Flood, before Nimrod was born: of which, thirty years to Cush ere he begat Seba, after whom he had Havilah, Sabbah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: and then thirty years to Raamah, ere he begat Sheba and Dedan, both which were born before Nimrod: and five years to his five elder Brothers, which make sixty five, and then twice thirty years for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba, and Dedan with others, to beget their Sons; and that a third Generation might grow up, which makes in all an hundred twenty five years; there will then remain six years to have been spent in travelling from the East, ere they arrived in Shinaar, in the year after the Flood 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might be of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to have arrived at Shinaar in the year 101. and the Confusion to have been at Peleg's birth, these men do all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the help of time; and build Nimrod's Tower in the Ayres: and not on those low and marish grounds (which require found foundations) in the Plains of Shinaar. For except that huge Tower were built in a day, there could be no confusion in that year 101. or at Peleg's birth. And therefore it is far more probable, that Nimrod usurped Regal authority in the 131. year after the Flood (according to Berosus) and that the Work of Babel lasted forty years (according to Glycas) Hominibus in ea periclitatis totis 40. annis incassum laborantibus; Men labouring in vain 40. years to finish it. By which account it falls out that it was 170. years after the Flood, ere a Colony was sent into East India; which granted, (the one being the main Body, and the other but a Troop taken thence) it can hardly be believed that Staurobates could have exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Emperors of all that part of the world gathered the most of Nations into one body.

¶ VI.

The fourth Argument from divers considerations in the person of Noah.

Fourthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the world before the Flood, and had lived therein the long time of 600. years, was all that space 130. years after the Flood without any certain habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conductor of those people, by Noah destined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Western World; (which Travails Noah put over to young and able bodies) and that Noah himself, then covered with many years, planted himself in the same place which God had assigned him; which was, where he first came down out of the Ark from the waters: for it is written, that after Noah came down out of the Ark, he planted a Vineyard; and became a Husbandman, whose business was to dress and manure the Earth; and not to range over so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia felix, where he should (if the Tradition be found) have left certain Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton; then into Spain where they say he settled other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his Sons Wives: from thence into Italy, wherewith they say he found his Son Cham the Saturn of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and subjects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the story) had patience for three years; but then finding no amendment, they say he banish'd him out of Italy. These be but the fancies of Berosus Annianus, a plain imitation of the Grecian fables. For let every reasonable man conceive, what it was to travel far in such a Forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the Earth by the Flood, the same lay wast and over-grown for 130. or 140. years, and wherein there could hardly be found either part or passage through which men were able to creep for Woods, Bushes, and Briers, that in those years were grown up.

And there are so many reasons, proving that Noah never came into the Valley of Shinaar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italy or Spain: For Noah who was Father of all those Nations, a man revered both for

for his Authority, Knowledge, Experience and Piety, would never have permitted his children and issues to have undertaken that unbelieving presumptuous work of Babel. Rather by his presence and prevalent persuasions he would have bound their hands from so vain labours, and by the authority which he received even from God himself, he would have held them in that awfull subjection, as, whatsoever they had vainly conceived or feared, yet they durst not have disobeyed the personal commandment of him, who in the beginning had a kind of Regal authority over his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of man-kind was by themselves purchased through cruelty and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise up building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a provocation of God to lay upon them the same, if not a more sharp affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that ever he came so far West as Babylonia; but rather, that he sent those numbers which came into Shinaar (being the greatest troop, because they had the greatest part of the World to plant) under Nimrod, or those upon whom he usurped. Nanclerus, and Celestinus, take the testimony of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for current, that there were three Leaders of the people after their increase (to wit) Nimrod, Sephene, and Joathan, of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, Joathan of Sem, and Sephene of Japhet. This opinion I cannot judge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a work as the Worlds Plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the Sons of Sem: Joathan, Havilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to have dwelt in the East-India. The rest of Sem's issues had also the Regions of Persia, and the other adjoining to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Ur, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sons of Joathan, or of all the rest a certain number (Cham and his issue only excepted) that Noah kept with himself, it cannot be known. Of which Plantation I shall speak at large in the Chapter following.

Now, another reason which moves me to believe that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinaar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the Story of the Hebrews, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah being the Father of all man-kind, and the chosen servant of God, was too principal a Person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the World) withdrawn himself, and rested a-part with his best Beloved, giving himself to the service and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their destined portions. For he landed in a warm and fertile soil, where he planted his Vineyard, and dressed the Earth; after which, and his thanksgiving to God by sacrifice, he is not remembered in the Scriptures, because he was so far away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrews chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

¶ VII.

Of the senseless opinion of Annius the Commentator upon Berosus: who finds divers places where the Ark rested; as the Caspian and Gordizean Hills, which are three hundred miles asunder; and also some places of Scythia.

It remaineth now that we examine the Arguments and Authorities of Frier Annius, who in his Commentaries upon Berosus and others, laboureth marvellously to prove that the Ark of Noah rested upon the Armenian Mountains called Caspia; which Mountains separate Armenia from the upper Media, and do equally belong to both. And because all his Authors speak of the Mountains of Gordier, he hath no other shift to unite these opinions, but by uniting those far-distant Mountains together. To effect which, he hath found no other invention, than to charge those men with error, which have carefully over-seen, Printed, and Published Ptolemy's Geography, in which they are altogether dissembled. For that last Edition of Abricatos sets these Hills five degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainly, if we look into those more ancient Copies of Vilavonanus, and others, we shall find nothing in them to help Annius withall: for in those the Mountains Caspia stand seven degrees to the East of the Gordier, which makes 420. miles. And for those Authors by whose authority Annius strengtheneth himself, Diodorus whom he so much followeth, giveth this judgment upon them in the like dispute. Aberrantur vero omnes, non negligentia, sed regnorum situs ignorantia; They have all erred (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdoms. But for an induction, to prove that the Ark of Noah stood on the Mountains of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of

of the Scythians: and to prove the same he citeth Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth that 250. years before Ninus, the Earth was overflown with Waters, Et in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; and that in Scythia the flock of mortal men was renewed. The same Author also teacheth, that the Umbri before remembered (who were so called, because saved from Deucalion's Flood) were the Sons of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his veni- ssimè Janum cum Dyrum, & Gallis progenito-ribus Umbrosum; From these Scythians, he saith, that Janus came with Dyrum, and with the Galli the progenitors of the Umbri: And again, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythia tribuitur; Certainly, the prime Antiquity of Off-spring is always given to the Scythi- ans. And herein truly I agree with Ammius, that those Regions called Scythia, and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia, A- stasia, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia under Tribute till Ninus's Time. Also Pliny called the Umbri which long since inhabited Italy, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who defended of these Scythians. Now, that which Ammius laboureth, is to prove that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Ne- phews of Noah) did first inhabit that Region of the Mountains, on which the Ark rested; and confessing that this great Ship was grounded in Armenia, he feigneth a Nation of Scythians called Araxee, taking name of the Mountain Ararat, near the River of A- raxee. And because his Author Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, That in Scythia mankind was restored after the great Flood 250. years before Ninus) and in part utterly de-stroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga; as, In Scythia Saga renat- um mortale genus; In Scythia Saga, mankind was restored: he therefore in the Proeme of his Commentary upon Berosus, leaveth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato's his words, and writes, homines in Scythia salvatos. For Scythia Saga, or Sa- ce, is undoubtedly under the Mountains of Parapamisus; on which, or near which it is most probable that the Ark first took ground: and from those East parts (according to Moses) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinar or Babylonia.

Gen. 11. 2.

But now, the best authority which Ammius hath, is out of Diodorus: where he hath read that the Scythians were originally Ar- menians, taking name & Scythia Rege corum, from Scythia their King. But (in a word) we may see his vanity, or rather (indeed) his falseness in citing this place. For Diodorus, a most approved and diligent Author, beginneeth in that place with these words: Fa- bulator Scythæ, The Scythians Fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that work, giveth this Title to that very Chapter; Scy- tharum origo & successus, fabula: The original and success of the Scythians, a Fable. And (indeed) there needs no great disproof hereof, since Ptolemy doth directly delineate Scythia Saga, or Sace, and sets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodo- tus) call all the Scythians, Sace; which Pliny confirms: for in respect that these Sace (saith Pliny) are the Scythians next to the Persians, therefore they gave all the rest that name. L. c. 11.

Now, that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man believeth.
But this supposed Scythia Araxee in Armenia lieth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42.
degrees distant from the Sace; and the Country about Araxee: Ptolemy calleth Col- thene, and Soducene; and Scapene; without any mention of Scythia: at all: and yet all those which are, or were reputed Scythians either within Imaus, or without, to the number of 100. several Nations, are by Ptolemy T. d. 11.
precisely set down.

But, to come to those latter Authors, whereof some have written, others have seen a great part of those North-East Regions, and searched their Antiquities with great diligence: First, Marinus Niger boundeth Scy- thia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scy- thia without these Mountains, is also beyond our purpose) Scythia inter Imaum montem ea est, que proprio vocabulo Gallaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu Sarmatiae Astasiæ ab Oriente Imao Monte: à Septentrione terra cognita: à Meridie Saccæ, Sogdiani, Margiani, usque ostia Oxæ annis intyrcannum mare exeuntis; & parte ipsius maris hinc usque, ad Rha fluminis ostia terminatur: Scythia within the Mountain Ima-us, is that part of the World which in their own speech is at this time called Gallaria; and the same is bounded on the West-side by Sarmatia Astasiæ, (or of Asia): on the East, by the Imaum Mountains: on the North, by unknown Lands: on the South, by the Saccæ (which are the Sace) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the month of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as far as the month of Rha.

Now, if Niger sets all Sarmatia Astasiæ to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (que magna sanè Regio est, & que innumeris nation-ibus completitur, Which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable nations, saith Niger) much of it being between Scythia and Ar- menia, doth sufficiently warrant us, that Ar- menia can be no part of Scythia; and to make make it more plain, he disleaveth Sarmatia itself from any part of Armenia, by the Re- gions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, which he leaveth on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian or Scythian Nation; neither doth his fellow-Frier John Plancarpio (cited by Vincentine in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neither doth Haytonus, an Armenian born of the blood of those Kings (though afterwards a Monk) ever acknowledg himself for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Races descended: though he writ that story at large, gathered by Nicolasus Salerni, and (by the commandment of Pope Clement the fifth) in the year 1307. published.

Neither doth Matthias a Michon (a Canon of Cracovia in Polonia) a Sarmatian born, and that travelled a great part of Sarmatia Astasiæ, find Armenia any way within the compass of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose Travails are extant) hath observed so much of those Regions as he hath done: proving and disproving many things, heretofore subject to dispute. And among others he burieth that ancient and received opinion, That out of the Mountains, Riphei, and Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the Rivers of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; proving by unanswerable experience, that there are no such Mountains in rerum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountains of those famous Rivers are now by the Trade of Moscovia known to every Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, woody, and marsh grounds. The River of Tanais or Don, ariseth to the South of the City Tulla, some twenty English miles, out of a Lake called Ivanovsejere, in the great Wood Oke- mitzkies or Jepiphanolies. Volga, which Pto- lemy calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Fronom, in the great Wood Vodkonaki: from which Lake the two other famous Rivers flow of Bory- sthenes (now Neyper) and Dniuna or Dniudna.
And this learned Polonian doth in this sort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Russians, Lithu- nians, Muscovians, and those adjoining, bounded on the West by the River of Vissa, the Name perchance mis-printed Vissa for Vistula, a River which parts Germania and Sarmatia; and for the East-border he nameth Tanais, or Don. Sarmatia Astasiæ he cutteth from Europe by the same River of Tanais, and the Caspian Sea; to with-hold it from stretching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolemy calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the Mountain Imaus. And the same Matthias Michon further affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Amnius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Astasiæ itself above three hundred and a few odd years before his own time: these be his words: Constat eam esse gentem novam, & ad- ventitiam a partibus Orientis (montis sedibus) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Asia Sarm-atiam ingressa: It is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coasts of the East: from whence they entered into Asia, & gat new seats a little more then 300. years since:

For (indeed) before that time the Golbs or Ponolcs inhabited Sarmatia Astasiæ. And this Matthias lived in the year 1511, and this his Discourse of Sarmatia was Printed at Angula in the year 1506. as Buchol- zerus in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) came from the East; for in the East it was, that the Ark of Noah rested, and the Scythia Saccæ were those people, which lived at the North foot of those Mountains, of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mix themselves with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimony then the general description of the North now extant, and the witness of Ptolemy, it is plain, that between all parts of Armenia, and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not on the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Araxee) between Jaxartus and Jatus; but what are these Scythians to any Araxee, or Scythia Araxee, which Ammius placeth in Armenia, more then the Scythians of Europe?

§. VIII.

The fifth Argument: The Vine must grow naturally near the place where the Arke rested.

TO this if we add the consideration of this part of the Text, That Noah planted a Vineyard, we shall find that the fruit of the Vine or Rayfin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Arke was supposed: for if the Vine was a stranger in Italy and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Arme- nia, being a far colder Country. For Tyr- reus must have brought Vines into France, and Europin.

Saturnus into Latium: yea at such times as Brennus and the Gauls invaded Italy, there were few or no Vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Camillus) the Gauls remained between the Pyrenæi and the Alpes, near unto the Senones, where they continued a long time, until they drunk Wine, which was first brought them out of Italy; and after they tasted thereof, they hasted to inhabit that Country, which brought forth such pleasant Fruit: so as it appeareth, that the Plant of the Vine was not natural in France, but from Italy brought thither; as by Saturn from else-where into Italy.

Now it is manifest, that Noah travelled not far to seek out the Vine. For the Plantation thereof is remembered, before there was any counsel how to dispose of the World among his children: and the first thing he did, was, to till the ground, and to plant a Vine-yard, after the Sacrifice and Thanksgiving to God; and wherefore the Ark rested, there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appear, that he travelled far: for the Scriptures teach us, that he was a Husband-man, and not a wanderer.

An answer to an objection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth.

And that all the children of Noah came together into Shinaar, it doth not appear, saying that it may be inferred out of these words (from thence) because it is written: So that the Lord scattered them [from thence] upon all the Earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Tower: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of sybilla (as they be converted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinaar; for they have this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem edificavit altissimam, quasi per eam Calum essent ascensuri: Certain of them built a most high Tower, as if they meant thereby to have scaled the Heavens.

An answer to the objection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hills there.

But before I conclude this part, it is necessary to see and consider what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out, to make it true or probable, that the Ark of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountains of Armenia. For the Text hath only these words: The Ark rested on (or upon) the Mountains of Ararat, or Armenia, saith the Marginal Note of the Geneva: the Chaldean Paraphrast calls it Kardu, of which, the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Ephraim. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint do not convert at all, but keep the same word) is taken to be a Mountain of Armenia; because Armenia it self had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the height (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Ark first fate thereon.

But these suppositions have no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountains of equal stature to many other Mountains of the World; and yet it doth not follow, that the Ark found the highest Mountain of all other to rest on: for the Plains were also uncovered before Noah came out of the Ark. Now, if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, we might give more credit to the conceit. For in the Books of the Sybilis it is written, that the Mountains of Ararat are in Phrygia, upon which it was supposed that the Ark stayed after the Flood. And the better to particularize the place and seat of these Mountains, and to prove them in Phrygia and not Armenia; they are placed where the City of Celene was afterward built. Likewise in the same description the maketh mention of Marjyas, a River which runneth through part of Phrygia and afterward joyneth it self with the River Meander, which is far from the Gordiean Mountain in Armenia. We may also find a great mistaking in Josephus (though out of Berosus, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that Josephus sets Ararat between Armenia and Parthia, toward Adiabene, and affirmeth withall, that in the Province of Caron (by others Kair and Arnos), so called by reason that the waters have from thence no descent, nor issue out, the people vaunt that they had in those days reserved some pieces of Noahs Ark. But Parthia toucheth no where upon Armenia; for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Province of Assyria: so that all Media and a part of Assyria is between Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discovery of the Mountains Cordie was first borrowed out of Berosus by Josephus, yet the Text which Josephus citeth out of Berosus differs far from the words of that

Berosus

Berosus, which wandereth up and down in these days let out by Annus. For Berosus, cited by Josephus, hath these words: Fertur & navigii hujus pars in Armenia apud montem Cordiarum superesse, & quoddam Bitumen inde absum secum reportare, quo vice amuleti loci hujus homines uti solent: (which is) It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenia upon the Gordiean Mountains; and that divers do scrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they use it in stead of an amulet. But Annus his Edition of the Fragment of Berosus useth these words: Nam elevata ab aquis in Gordia montis vertice quicquid, ejus adhuc dicitur aliqua pars esse, & homines ex illa Bitumen tollere quo maxime utuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Ark being lifted up by the waters, rested on the top of the Gordiean Mountains, of which it is reported that some parts remain, and that men do carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith: so as in these two Texts (besides the difference of words) the name is diversely written. The ancient Berosus writes Cordias with a (C); and the Fragment Gordie with a (G); the one that the Bitumen is used for appeasement against Poyson or Inchantment; the other, in Sacrifice. And if it be said that they agree in the general, yet it is reported by neither from any certain knowledge, nor from any approved Author: for one of them, useth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur) the one, that so it is reported, the other, that so it is said; and both but by hear-say, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Historian, as wise men neither report after it, nor give credit to any thing they receive from it.

Furthermore, these Mountains which Ptolemy calls Gordie, are not those Mountains which himself giveth to Armenia, but he calleth the Mountains of Armenia, Moschici. These be his own words: Montes Armenia nominantur ii, qui Moschici appellantur, qui protendentur usque ad superjacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & Mons qui Parjardes dicitur: The Mountains of Armenia are they which are called Moschici, stretched along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: also the Hill which is called Parjardes: which Mountains Ptolemy calleth Pariedri, and both which ly to the North of Gordie or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a half; and the Gordiean Mountains in 39. and a half: from the Northmost of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordians, and then Georgians, who amidst all the strength of the greatest Infidels of Persia and Turkie, do still remain Christians. Concerning the o- ther suppositions, that the Mountains of Gordie, otherwise Baris, Kardu or Lubar (which Ptolemy calleth Torgodasion) are the highest of the World, the same is absolutely false.

§. XI.

Of Caucasus, and divers far higher Hills than the Armenians.

For the best Cosmographers, with other, that have seen the Mountains of Armenia find them far inferiour, and under-set to divers other Mountains even in that part of the World, and else where: as the Mountain Athos between Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolemy calls Olympus, now called Lacas, (saith Castaldus) is far surmounting any Mountain that ever hath been seen in Armenia: for it casteth shade three hundred furlongs, which is seven and thirty miles and upwards: of which Plutarch; Athos adumbrat latera Lemnia bevis: Athos shadoweth the Cow of Lemnos. Also the Mount of Olympus in Thessalie, is said to be of that height, as neither the Winds, Clouds, or Rains overtop it. Again, the Mountain of Antandrus in Assyria, not far from Ida, whence the River Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is also of a far more admiration than any in Armenia, and may be seen from Constantinople. There are also in Mauritania near the Sea, the famous Mountains of Atlas, of which Herodotus: Exstat in hac mari Mons cui nomen Atlas, ita sublimis esse dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculi mortalium pervenire non possint: Upon this Coast there is a Mountain called Atlas, whose height is said to be such, as the eye of no mortal man can discern the top thereof. And if we may believe Aristotle, then are all these inferiour to Caucasus; which he maketh the most notorious both for breadth and height: *Caucasus Mons omnium maximus, qui aestivum ad ortum sunt acuminis atq; latitudine, cujus iuga a Sole radiatur usq; ad continuium ab ortu: & iterum ab occasu: Caucasus (saith Aristotle) is the greatest Mountain both for breadth and height of all those in the North-east, whose tops are lightened by the Sun-beams (usq; ad continuium) which is, saith Macrobius, between the first crowing after mid-night and the break of day: Others affirm, that the top of this Mountain holds the Sun-beams when it is dark in the Valleys; but I cannot believe either, for the highest Mountain of the World known, is that of Tenerife in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Westward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enjoy the Sun's company at* any such late hours. Besides these Mountains which Aristotle calleth Caucasus, are those which separate Colchis from Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth divide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the River of Phasis riseth in the same Mountain, which himself calleth Caucasus; and that Phasis springeth from those Hills which funder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which River (it is manifest) yieldeth it self to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapesus (now Trabesunde) howsoever Mercator bring it from Paryardes.

Of divers incongruities if in this Story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth first appear, that there is no certainty what Mountain Ararat was: for the Books of the sybils set it in Phrygia; and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authority, those men have great want of proofs that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Babyl was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Ark grounded thereon, the assertion and supposition have equal credit: for there are many Hills which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Ark should sit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proved that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in verum natura, as Babyl: for Babyl (saith Hierom) signifieth high Towers; and so may all high Hills be called indifferently: and therefore we may better give the name of Babyl to the Hills of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) then to any Hills of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are undoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authors themselves do not agree in what Region the Mountains Gordaei stand: for Ptolemy distinguisheth the Mountains of Armenia from the Gordaei, and calleth those of Armenia, Moschici and Paryardes, as aforesaid. Now Paryardes is seated near the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth Eufrates, and out of the East-side, Araxis: and the Mountains Moschici are those Hills which disjoin Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

¶ XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia, to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvel that the same Ledge of Hills, running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all along: and even in India be called Ararat.

Lastly, we must blow up this Mountain Ararat it self, or else we must dig it down, and carry it out of Armenia; or find it elsewhere, and in a warmer Country, and (withal) set it East from Shinarum, or else we shall wound the Truth it self with the weapons of our own vain imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to every eye, we must understand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, so called, no more then any one Hill among those Mountains which divide Italy from France, is called the Alps: or any one among those which part France from Spain is the Pyrenians. But as these, being continuations of many Hills, keep one name in divers Countries, so all that long Ledge of Mountains, which Pliny calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolemy both Taurus, Niphates, Charrat, Coronus, Sariphi, until they encounter and cross the Mountains of the great Indus, are of one general name, and are called the Mountains of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seem to arise. So all these Mountains of Hyrcania, Armenia, Cavaxis, Caspia, Moschici, Amazonici, Hemathici, Syrbici, (thus diversely called by Pliny and others) Ptolemy calls by one name Caucasus, lying between the Seas Caspium and Euxinus: as all those Mountains which cut at under America, even from the new Kingdom of Granado, to the streight of Adagellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountains of Ararat run East and West, so do those marvellous Mountains of Indus stretch themselves North and South; and being of like extent well-neer, are called by the name of Imanus; even as Pliny called these former Hills Taurus, and Moses the Hills of Ararat. The reason of several names given by Ptolemy, was, thereby, the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdoms, which these great Mountains bound and sever: as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Affria, Media, Assiana, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Paropamisus: having all these Kingdoms, either on the North or South side of them. For all the Mountains of Asia (both the less and the greater) have three general names, (to wit) Taurus, Imanus, and Caucasus: and they receive other titles, as they sever and divide particular Places and Regions. For these Mountains which funder Cilicia from the rest of Asia the less, on the North-side, are called Taurus; and those

Mountains which part it from Comagena (a Province of Syria) are called Amanns: the Mountains called Taurus, running East and West, as Imanus doth North and South. Through Taurus, the River of Eufrates forceth her passage, leaving the name of Amanns to the Mountains on her West-bank, and on her East-side the Mountains are sometimes known by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolemy's three Tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates (as in the fourth) retaining that uncertain appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia: and after the River of Tygris cutteth them asunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, until they separate Affria and Media; but then they call themselves Coatras, though between the upper and nether Media, they do not appear, but altogether discontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but run through the Eastern Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves Orontes, and towards the East part Coronus, out of the Southern part whereof the River of Euphrates riseth, which divideth the ancient Persians from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they give to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the Mountains of Sariphi, out of which riseth the River Margus, afterward yielding her self to Oxus (now Abia;) and drawing now near their ways end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Paropamisus; and lastly, of Caucasus, even where the famous River of Indus, with his principal companions, Hydaspis and Zaradrus, spring forth and take beginning. And here do these Mountains build themselves exceeding high, to equal the strong Hills called Imanus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35, 36, and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delanguer, and the rest Nagracot; and these Mountains in this place ought to be properly called Caucasus (saith Ptolemy) that is, between Paropamisus and Imanus: and improperly, between the two Seas of Caspium and Pontus.

¶ XIV.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountain Caucasus, and toward the East-Indies: and of other excellencies of the soil.

NOW, in this part of the World it is, where the Mountain and River Janus, and the Mountain Nysus, (so called of Ezechus Nysus, or Noah) are found: and on these highest Mountains of that part of the World did Coropius Becanus conceive that the Ark of Noah grounded after the Flood; of all his conjectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indo-scythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantastical opinions of this subject. And as the same Becanus also noteth, that as in this part of the World are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34, 35, and 36. degrees of Septentrional Latitude, are the most delicate Wines of the World, namely, in Judea, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana: and under these Mountains Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palestina, where the searchers of the Land, by Moses direction, found bunches of equal bigness at Escol.

The fruitfulness of this place (to wit) on the South bottom of these Hills, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana, near the Mountains of Meror, did Alexander feast himself and his Army ten days together, finding the most delicate Wine of all other.

¶ XV.

The Conclusion, with a brief repeating of divers chief points.

AND therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountains do also traverse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it self sometime is known by the name of Ararat. But, as Pliny giveth to this Ledge of high Hills, even from Cilicia to Paropamisus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the Hills of France and Germany are called the Alps: and all between France and Spain the Pyrenes: and in America the continuation of Hills for 3000 miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the general name which Moses gave them; the diversity of appellations no otherwise growing, than by their dividing and bordering divers Regions, and divers Countries. For in the like case do we call the Sea, which entrench by Gibraltar, the Mediterrane and in-land Seas; and yet where it walleth the Coasts of Carthage, and over against it, it is called Tyrrhenum: between Italy and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Dnaxxo, Adriaticum: between Athens and Asia, Egeum: between Sesius and Abylus.

dw, Hellespont: and afterward Pontus, Propontis, and Bosphorus. And as in these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Denealedonyum: and on this side, the Brittain Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this Question, we must appeal to that Judge which cannot erre, even to the Word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plain sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction than the words bear literally, because they are used to the very same plain purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely, where the sense is plain (and being so understood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconvenience or contrariety) we ought to be wary, how we fancy to our selves any new or strange exposition; And (withall) to resolve our selves, that every word (as aforesaid) hath his weight in Gods Book. And therefore we must respect and reverence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as Saint Augustine hath taught us, touching the Gospel of Christ Jesus (which is) Negat alter accipiat (quod narravit) Discipulis Christi in Evangelio legerit, quod si plane verum Dei, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, contemneret: That no man otherwise take or understand that which be readeth in the Gospel (the Disciples of Christ having written it) than if he had seen the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his own body, setting it down.

The words then of Moses, which end this Dispute, are these: And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinaar, and there they abode: which proveth without controversy, that Nimrod, and all with him, came from the East into Shinaar; and therefore the Ark of Noah rested and took land to the Eastward thereof. For we must remember, that in all places whereover Moses maketh a difference of Countreys, he always precisely nameth toward what quarter of the World the same were seated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Japheth, he nameth Sebar, a Mountain in the East: where he remembreth Cains departure from the presence of God, he addeth; And Cain dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the East-side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham, after he departed from Sechem, he useth these words; Afterward removing thence unto a Mountain Eastward from Beitbel, he pitched his Tent: Gen. 12. 8. having Beitbel on the West-side, and Hai on the East: and afterward in the ninth Verse of the same Chapter, it is written; And Abraham went forth journeying towards the South: also when Ezekiel prophesieth of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these Nations of Togor were of the North-quarters: and of the Queen of Saba it is written, that she came from the South to visit Solomon: And the Magi, (or Wisemen) came out of the East to offer presents unto Christ. And that all Regions, and these travels were precisely set down upon the points of the Compass and Quarters of the World, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Judea; Saba South from Hiernsalem: the way from Beitbel to Egypt directly South; and the Celebryans, the Tubalites, and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palestina, and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that Valley of Babylonia, is not a journeying from the East, nor so near unto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it self; and we must not say of Moses (whose hands the holy Ghost directed) that he erred too early, and that he knew not East from West. For the body of Armenia stretcheth in forty three degrees Septentrional, and the North part thereof in forty five; and those Gordisean Mountains, whereon it was supposed that the Ark rested, stand in forty one, but Babylonia, and the Valley of Shinaar are situated in thirty five, and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference between East and West) the Gordisean Mountains stand in 75. degrees, and the Valley of Shinaar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lieth from Shinaar North-west, 25. degrees from the East; and if Armenia had been by North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the Compass. But Gregory, and Hierome warn us, In scripturis ne minima differentia omittat debet: nam brevis sermo, syllaba, apice, & minus in aliqua scriptura plena sunt sensus. In the scriptura ne levis differentia may not be omitted, for every speech, syllable, note, or accent, and point in divine scripturas are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth us that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not believe Writers (of little authority) who also speak by hear-say, and by report, Uter sit, & ut dicatur, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all adventure. But this is infallibly true, that Shinaar lieth West from the place where the Ark of Noah rested after the Flood; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first civil, which which had Noah himself for an instructor: and directly East from Shinaar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest Grapes, and the best Wine. The great Armies also which overtopped in number those Millions of Semiramis, prove, that those parts were first planted. And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for my self I build on his words, who in plain terms hath told us, That the Sons of Noah came out of the East into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Ark rest on those Eastern Mountains, called by one general name Taurus, and by Moses the Mountains of Ararat, and not on those Mountains of the North-west, as Berosus first feigned, whom most part of the Writers have followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentiful warm East where Noah rested, where he planted the Vine, where he tilled the ground and lived thereon. *Placuit vero Noacho agricultura studium, in qua tractanda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eamque rem sua ipsius lingua Ish-Adamath (hoc est) telluris vir appellatur celebratque est, the study of Husbandry pleased Noah (saith the excellent learned man Arias Montanus) in the knowledge and order of which it is said that Noah excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his own language, a man exercised in the earth. Which also theweth, that he was no wanderer; and that he troubled not himself with the contentions beginning again in the World, and among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the World where he was first delivered out of the Prison of the Ark, wherinto God had committed him, to preserve him and mankind.*

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Flood; and of the Sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

Whether Shem and Ham were elder then Japheth.

Of these Sons of Noah, Which was the eldest, there is a question made. St. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Japheth for the youngest: and herein the opinions of Writers are divers. But this we find every where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was never any respect given to the eldest in years, but in virtue; as by the examples of Henoch, Abraham, Jacob, and David, is made manifest. In a few words, this is the ground of the controversy; The Latine Translation, and so the Geneva, hath converted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these words: Unto Shem also the Father of all the Sons of Heber, and elder brother of Japheth, were children born. But Junius, agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same words in this manner: To Shem also the Father of all the Sons of Heber, and brother of Japheth the eldest son, were children born: So the translation of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Japheth, as it is in the vulgar Translation placed before it, then had it been as plain for Japheth, as it is by these Translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in blood, but to the eldest in piety, yet the arguments are stronger for Japheth then for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly understood without any danger or inconvenience, it seemeth strange why any man of judgment should make valuation of conjectural arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the five hundredth year of his life, begat the first of his three Sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth: and in the six hundredth year (to wit) the hundredth year following, came the general Flood; two years after which, Shem begat Arphaxad, which was in the year 602. of Noah's life, and in the year of Shem's life one hundred: so as Shem was but an hundred years old, two years after the Flood; and Noah begat his first born being 500. years old; and therefore were Shem the elder, he had then been an hundred years old at the Flood, and in the six hundredth year of Noah's life, and not two years after. Which seeing the Scriptures before remembreth hath denied him, and that it is also written: Then Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger son had done unto him (to wit) Ham; of necessity the first place doth belong to Japheth. This younger son, so converted by the Vulgar and Geneva, Junius

This partition and portion of Japheth, with the part which he held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah, Dilate Dew Japheth; Let God spread abroad (or increase the Posterity of) Japheth, and let him dwell in the Tents of Shem. For though Junius here useth the word alliciat, and not dilatet: and the Geneva, persuadeth; yet the Septuagint have dilatet, or amplificet; and such was the blessing given to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his seed for ever. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the Posterity of Japheth: noting not only an enlargement of Territories, but that thereby they should be made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Japheths Sons, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may believe Berosus and Annus, whose authority the greatest number of all our late Writers have followed) did in the tenth year of Nimrods Reign, depart from Babylonia, & planted Italy: which also Functius confirmeth in these words, Anno decimo Nimrodi, &c. In the tenth year of Nimrods Reign, Gomerus Gallus planted a Colony in that Land afterward called Italy: and in the twelfth year of the same Nimrods Reign, Tubal seated himself in Austuria in Spain (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. years after the Flood, according to Berosus. But this opinion is very ridiculous: For before the confusion of Tongues, the Children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let us therefore consider with reason, what time the building of such a City and Tower required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any ready means to perform such a work as Nimrod had erected (and as Functius himself out of his Author Berosus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem Montium; To the height and magnitude of the Mountains. Sure that both this City and Tower was almost builded, the Scriptures witness: but the Lord came down to see the City and Tower which the Sons of men had builded. Let us then but allot a time sufficient for the making of Brick to such a Work of the greatest height (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that ever was. For where the universal Flood covered the highest Mountains fifteen Cubits; Let us build us a City and Tower (saith Nimrod) whose top may reach unto the Heaven: meaning, that they would raise their work above fifteen Cubits higher than the highest Mountain, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the fear of a second Inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the work. They also began this building upon a ground, the most oppressed with waters of all the world: as by the great ruine which these waters forcibly over-bearing and overflowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest: approved also by the Prophet Jeremie, speaking of Babylon in these words: Thou that dwellest upon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantial foundation for so high a raised building on a marshy ground: and to which Glyca upon Gensio giveth forty years. For it seemeth that the Tower was near finished when God overthrew it: it being afterward written; So the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the Earth; and they left to build the City. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the Tower is not then named) that they very near had performed the work of their supposed defence, which was the Tower: and that afterward they went on with the City adjoining, wherein they inhabited. It is also to be noted, that till such time as this confusion seized them (whereupon the Tower was thrown down) these Nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them upon all the Earth. (that was) when they perceived not one anothers speech. Now, to think that this work, in the newness of the World, (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten years; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same year, could creep through 3000. miles of Desert, with Women, Children, and Cattel: Let those light believers, that neither tie themselves to the Scripture, nor to reason, approve it, for I do not. And if the Ark of Noah was 100. years in building, or but near such a time, (and then) when the World had stood 1556. years; it were more than foolishness, and madness itself, to think that such a work as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the Flood to the arrival at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. years, and whereof they had spent some part in travelling from the East. Again, if all Asia set to their helping hands, in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that Work 400. years (or be it but half that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourished in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plenty of materials and carriages: This Work of the Tower of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those those few years remembred. And for conclusion, let all men of judgment weigh with themselves how impossible it was for a Nation or Family of men, with their Wives and Children, and Cattel, to travel 3000. miles through Woods, Bogs, and Desarts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall find it rather a work of 100. years than of 100. days. For in the West Indies, of which the Spaniards have the experience, in those places where they found neither path nor guide, they have not entered the Country ten miles in ten years. And if Nimrods people spent many years by the account before remembred in passing from the East India, or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. degrees of Longitude, until they came into Shinaar, which lieth in 79. degrees (the distance between those places containing 36. degrees, which makes 720. leagues, which is 2160. miles) and did all the way keep the Mountains and hard ground; then the difference between Babilon and Biscay is much more: for the body of Biscay lieth in ten degrees, and Babilon, or Shinaar, (as afore said) in 79. so the length of way from Shinaar to Austuria, or Biscay, is 69. degrees, which make 1380. leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod took divers years to find Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles: or supposing that the Ark rested in Armenia) little above 400. miles: there is no cause to the contrary, but to allow as many years to Gomer and Tubal to travel 3000. miles, to Countries less known unto them by far, than the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradise was known to Noah before the Flood: and so was the Region of Eden by Noas afterward remembred; but what he understood of most part of the world else, it is unknown. And therefore did Annus ill advise himself to plant Gomer in Italy, and Tubal in Spain, in the tenth and twelfth of Nimrods Reign: Shall the Earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a Nation be born at once? But it may be objected, that the Sons of Japheth might come by Sea, and so save this great travel through Desarts by Land. But we never read of any Navigation in those days, nor long after: Surely, he that knoweth what it is to imbarque so great a People, as we may justly suppose those Conductors carried with them, will not easily believe that there were any Vessels in those days to transport Armies, and (withall) their Cattel, by whose milk they lived, and fed their children: For milk and fruit were the banquetting dishes of our Fore-Fathers. And in the eldest times, even the Kings and Fathers of Nations valued themselves by the Herds and numbers of their Cattel: who had Flocks of Sheep, and great Drovers and Herds of their own, and their own Shepherds and Herdsmen. Now, if Tubal had pait by Sea from any part of Palastina, Syria, or Siucia, he might have made good choice within the Streights, and not have overgone Granada, Valencia, and other Provinces in that Tract; past the Streights of Gibraltar; dislaid all Andalusia and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and Countreys; and have fought out the Iron, Woody, and barren Countrey of the World (called Biscay) by a long and dangerous Navigation. But before the journey of the Argonauts, there were scarce any Vessels that durst cross the Seas in that part of the World: and yet that which Jafon had (if the tale be true) was but a Gallei, and a poor one (God knows) and perchance, such as they use this day in Ireland: which although it carried but four and fifty passengers, yet it was far greater than any of the former times: Erat enim antea parvarum navicularum usus: For in former times they used very small vessels. I deny not but that the Tyrans gave themselves of old to far-off Navigations, whence Tibullus ascribed the invention of Ships to them:

Prima vatem, ventis credere docti a Tyros.

Tyros knew first how Ships might use the Wind.

And for those Boats called Longe naues, or Gallies, Pliny saith, that Agesias ascribed the device to Pericles: and Philocephanus to Jafon: Ctesius, to Samyras; and Sappharis, to Semiramis: Archimachus, to Aegeon: to which invention the Erythraei are said to have added certain numbers of Oars: and then Antiochus the Corinthian to have increased them: the Carthaginians afterwards to have brought them to four Banks: the Chinese Rems first to have been used by Neichon the Salamitian, with which Vessels, in those parts of the World, the Romans served themselves in the Punic War. But these be, perhaps, but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cast the devising of these Gallies on Sesostris, though Semiramis used them in the passage of her Army over Indus in Abrahams time. So it is said, that Danus was the first brought a Ship into Greece; and yet the Samothracians challenge the invention: and yet Tertullian (on the contrary) gives it to Minerva: others, to Neptune; Thucydides, to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those Ages, as the Egyptians used to coast the shores of the Red-Sea upon ratts, devised by King Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Britans had a kind of Boat (with which they crost the Seas) made of small twigs, and covered over with leather: of which kind I have seen at the Dingle in Ireland, and else-where. Naves ex corio circumfusa in Oceano Britannico (saith Textor:) of which Lucan the Poet:

And although it cannot be denied, when Noah, by Gods inspiration, was instructed in so many particulars concerning the Ark, that then many things concerning Navigation were first revealed; yet it appears that there was much difference between the Ark of Noah, and such Ships as were for any long Navigation. Yea, ancient Stories shew, that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume upon any long voyages to Sea, at least with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cattel; as also common reason can tell us, that even now, when this Art is come to her perfection, such Voyages are very troublesome and dangerous. So as it doth appear, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or use of Ships, fit for any long navigation. For, if Gomer and Tubal had passed themselves and their people by Sea; the exercise of Navigation would not have been dead for so many hundred years after. Leaving therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men else to their fancies, who have cast Nations into Countreys far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moses and the Prophets: to which Truth there is joynd both Nature, Reason, Policie, and Necessity: and to the rest, neither probability, nor possibility.

S. IV.

NOW, although many learned and reverend men have formed (I know not whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which also hath been and is received; yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great Learned man of this latter Age, Arian Montanus, was also in some things much mistaken: and for Josephus, as he hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errors withall; so was he in the Plantation of the World very gross and fabulous; whereby both Eusebius, Hierosolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that have been by him far mis-led. But the better to conceive what Regions of the World Gomer the Son of Japheth posselt, as also Tubal, it is needfull to begin with Magog: because the Scriptures take most knowledge of Gog and Magog: which two names have troubled many Commentators, saith Matth. Beroaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that ever I read) I find most judicious in the examination of this Plantation. He takes authority from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapters directeth us, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togarmians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince, or chief Conductor in their Attempts against Israel. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia, which Japheth Issues posselt, all Asia the Left was peopled by them. And that those of the Issue of Japheth (whom Ezechiel speaks of) were seated hereabout, it may best appear, if we consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependency upon the former Prophecie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter Ezechiel prophesieth of the uniting of the two Kingdoms of Israel and Juda, after their delivery from Captivity.

By which Prophecie of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to give life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpose it is written; And David my Servant shall be King over them, and they shall have one shepherd, (that is) they shall be united as they were in David's time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter, Ezechiel prophesieth against those Nations, which should seek to impeach this Union, and disturb the people of Israel, whom God purposed to receive to grace, and promised to restore. And so in the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infested the Israelites after their return, and fought to subject them: all which were the Subjects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Caelogyrans, next bordering ing Palestina, or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia the Left, which lay North from Judea. The words of Ezechiel are these: Son of man, set thy face against Gog, and against the Land of Magog, the chief Princes of Meshech (or Mosoch) and Tubal: and afterward Behold, I come against the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal: and in the sixth Verse; Gomer and all his Bands, and the House of Togorma of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel having first delivered the purpose of his Prophecie, teacheth what Nations they were that should in vanity assay Israel. He joyneth them together under their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Juda, and how feared and joyned together. Gog signifieth in the Hebrew (saith Saint Hierom) seclusion or covering of a house; and Pinitus upon Ezechiel affirmeth, that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (saith he) Antichristus erit Diaboli regnum sub specie humana: That Antichrist shall be the covering of the Devil under humane form. He addeth, that Magog is as much to say as Gog: the Letter (M) being an Hebrew Preposition, and importeth as much as of, or, from: so he taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So far Pinitus; at least in this not amiss, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person, but for a Nation: with which agreeth this observation of Beroaldus, Magog (saith he) in Hebrew is written Ham-Magog, which sheweth Magog to be a Region or Nation: for the Letter (He) which is used but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrews call Heliadodia) is never added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called either Magog, or, according to others, the people of Gog) also Prince of Meshech (or Mosoch) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 29. Chapter is made manifest: Behold, I come against thee Gog the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal. This must needs be meant by the Successors of Selencus Nicanor, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seek to make the Jew their Tributaries only, but indevoured by all means, and by all kind of violence, to extinguish the Religion itself (which the Hebrews profess'd) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serve the mortal and rotten gods of the Heathen; of which nothing remained but the very name, and dead Images. S. Ambrose, and Isidore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths: belike, because they invaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places and cities thereabout. Hermolus Barbarus out of Pomp. Metela derives the Turks from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a Man: others, of a Region: others, for a Nation inhabiting a Region, as Junius, who says that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominated from him whom the Greeks Stories call Cyges: who in former time having slain Candaules the Lydian, gave his own name to that Nation, thence after called Cygader: and thereof also the Cygean Lake; which Lake Strabo also findeth in Lydia (of which Cyges was King) fortie Furlongs from Sardis. Plinie calleth it Cygeum stagnum. Herodotus and Nicanor set it about the Rivers of Hyllus, and Mander; but the difference is not great. Marinus Niger maketh mention of this Cyge King of Lydia: who, after he had subdued the Country about the River Rhodium which runneth into the Helle-spont, called the Promontory Trapez after his own name Cyges. These Opinions do also seem to strengthen that of Junius. For Magog, saith he, is that part of Asia the Left, which Halyattes obtained, and after him his Son Craesus; who (as Junius further notes) having mastered all those Regions as far South as Libanus, in that Border built the City Gigarta, or Gogkarta (which in the Syrian signifieth the City of Gog) seated in Caelosyria, whose People were the ancient Enemies of the Jew.

Now, that Magog is found in Caelosyria, Plinie affirmeth, saying; Caelosyria vocat Bamyceam, que alio nomine Hierapolis habetur: Syris vero, Magog; Caelosyria bath in Bamyce, which in another name is called Hieropolis; but of the Syrians, Magog. He further telleth us, that the monstrous Idol Atergatis, called by the Greeks Derceto, was here worshipped. Lucian makes mention hereof, saying, That the City had anciently another name, which he yet expresseth not; forbearing, perhaps, the word Magog, as founding nothing elegantly in the Greek. But if we may believe Strabo, then was Edessa in Mesopotamia, the same Bamyce or Hierapolis, where the same Idol was worshipped. Ortelius is doubtful whether one of these Authors did not mistake the place of this Bamyce, or Hierapolis. It may well enough be, that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certain it is, that both of them lay due North from Palestina, and were both subject unto the Kings of the Race of Selencus. Now, I do not condemn the Opinion of Hermolus Barbarus following Josephus, but grant that, perhaps, Magog might also be the Father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made Prince of Magog, the Nations of Caelosyria, and the North parts adjoining be meant by Magog: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might be propagated into scythia. Yet it is not to be denied, that the scythians in old times coming out of the North-east, wasted the better part of Asia the less, and posselt Celsogryia, where they built both scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezechiel had reference, it is very plain: for this City Hierapolis or Magog standeth due North from Judea, according to the words of Ezechiel, that from the North-quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infested the Israelites were the Ptolemies, Kings of Egypt: so those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the Successors of Selenus, the Successors of Alexander Macedon. Gulienus Tyrinus thinks that this Hierapolis is that Rages, mentioned in the Story of Tobias. Pliny takes it not only to have been called Babylone, as we have said, but also Edessa: not that by Euphrates; but another of the same name: now, the known name is Aleppo: for so Bellonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This City had the Title of Sacred, as the Sacred City, (for so the word Hierapolis signifies) yet was it a place of most detested Idolatry, and wherein was worshipped the Idol of the Mermaid Atergates, or Atergite, according to Pliny, which the Greeks call Dereto.

If then we confer the words of Ezechiel in the third Verse of the thirty eight Chapter, wherein he joyneth together Gog, Meshech and Tubal; and withal remember that Hierapolis was the City of Magog, which also is seated directly North from Judea: with whom also Ezechiel completh Gomer, and all his bands of the North quarters; we may (as I conceive) safely conclude, that these Followers and Vassals of Gog (which were Northern Nations in respect of Judea) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spain, but a people of the lesser Asia, and Celsogryia: and therefore that the opinions of Berosus, Josephus, and whoever else hath followed them therein, are to be rejected. But if Josephus refer himself to latter times, and think that some Colonia of the Tubalines came from Iberia and Asia pass into Spain (to wit) from that piece of Land between Colchis (or Mengrelia) and Albania, (most part possessed by the Georgians) then is his judgment of better allowance. For without any repugnancy of opinions, it may be granted, that in process of time these people might from their first habitation, pass into the Countries near the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after-Ages into Spain.

Josephus makes mention of the Iberi, laying, that they were antiently called Thobelos, as of Tubal; from whence (saith Justine) they passed into Spain to search out the mines of that Region: having belike understood that it was a Southerly Country, and Mountainous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes, lived altogether by the exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witnesseth in these following Verses, telling how the Argonauts did visit them:

*Hac gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas sindis sub montibus altis:
Mercurius hac mutat, qua vita alimenta misistrant.*

The Chalybes plough not their barren soil,
But undermine high Hills for Iron Veins:
Changing the purchase of their endless toil

For Merchandize, which their poor lives sustains.

But it is more probable, that Spain was first peopled by the Africans, who had ever since an affection to return thither, and to re-people it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were easily drawn to pass over the Straights into that Country; and after by the *Moor*s who held Granado, and the South parts, eight hundred years, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are more probable, than that in the twelfth year of *Nimrod*s Reign, Tubal pass into Spain, and therein built Saint Uval: a poor Town, and a poor device, God knows. Certain it is, that we must find Meshech or Meshech, and Tubal Neighbours, and Gomer and Togarma not far off, or else we shall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Meshech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togarma their assistants, And that Meshech inhabited Asia, Functius (though he followed Berosus) confesseth, for these be his words: Mesachus, qui à Mose Mesech, priscus Mesas ab Adia nante usque ad Ponticam regionem posuit: hec regio posset Cappadocia dicta est, in qua verbi Mazica, &c. hac est terra Magog principalis; Mesachus, whom Moses calleth Mesech, placed the ancient Mesians from the Mount Adulas, unto the Coasts of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Town Mazica, &c. this is the principal Country of Magog. And this doth Annus alio avow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Mesech and Tubal: and therefore that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spain lying directly West, and not North from Judea. Alfo Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophecieth phecieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Meshech and Tubal jointly. And for a final proof, that these Nations were of a Northern Neighbour Land (how far soever stretched) Ezechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all Horimen. Thou, and much people with thee, all shall ride upon Horses, even a great multitude, and a mighty. Then, if any man believe that these troupes came out of Spain over the Pyrene, and first passed over a part of France, Italy, Hungary, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued again about the Hellefont, or else compassed all Pontus, and Euxinus, to come into the lesser Asia, which is half the length or compass of the then known World; he may be called a strong Believer, but he shall never be justified thereby. But on the contrary, it is known that Solenus was a Province neighbouring Palestina or Judea, and that Hierapolis (or Magog) joyned unto it: whose Princes commanded all Syria, and Asia the less, (namely, the Seleucida) and held it, till Scipio Asiaticus overthrew Antiochus the Great: after which yet they posselt Syria, till the time of Tigranes: and whether Meshech be in Cappadocia, or under Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the same Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be said. First, he seated himself with Togarma, not far from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward he proceeded further into Asia the less; and in long tract of time his valiant Issue filled all Germany, rested long in France and Brittany, and possessed the utmost borders of the Earth, accomplishing (as Melancthon well notes) the signification of their Parents name, which is Utmost bordering. But when these borderers wanted further place, wherein they might exonerate their swelling multitudes that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they return upon the Nations occupying the Countreys, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy Restorer of our Antiquities, M. William Camden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old Language doth signifie Robbers; necessity forcing them to spoil their Neighbours, to whom in their original, they were as near joyned, as afterwards in the seats which they possessed. For that the Warlike Nations of Germany were in elder Ages accustomed to be beaten by the Gauls, the authority of Cesar affirming it, is proof sufficient. But in times following, they pursued richer Conquests, and more ease, though further distant, by which (to omit their other enterprises not here to be spoken of) they were drawn at length into Asia the less, and occupied those parts, which had formerly been held by their Progenitors. I lay not that they claimed those Lands as theirs by Decent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their own Pedigree. Neither can any man therefore deny, that they were of old seated in Asia, because in late Ages they returned thither; unless he will think, that all those Nations which from far parts have invaded and conquered the Land of Sinai, may by that Argument be proved not to have illud from thence at the first.

Now, concerning Samothres, for his excellent wisdom, surnamed Dh, whom Annus makes the Brother of Gomer and Tubal (which Brother, Moses never heard of, who spake his knowledge of *Japheth*s Sons) they must find him in some old Poet: For Funfimus, a great Berosian, confesseth: Quis hic Samothres fuerit incertum est; Who this Samothres was, it is uncertain; neither is there any proof that he was that same Dh, whom Cesar saith the Gauls suppose to be their Ancestors, yea, and Vignier confesseth with Funfimus: Mays on ne sçayt qui il estoit; No man knows who he was.

§. V.

Against the fabulous Berosus his Fiction, That the Italian Janus was Noah.

BUT before I go on with Noah his Sons, I think it is necessary to disprove the Fiction on which Annus hath of Noah himself, an invention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as he hath wrested) by those Authors of whom himself hath Commented: as the Fragment of Berosus, Fabius, Priscor, Cato, Lavinus and others. For Annus seeks to persuade us, that Noah (surnamed Janus) was the same which founded Genoa, and other Cities in Italy, wherein he lived 92 years. This to disprove, by Moses silence, is a sufficient argument to me, if there were nothing else to disprove it. For, if he vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Acchad, Chalne and Nineve, by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great mark to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92 years. But it were a needless labour for me to disprove the authority of that Berosus, on whom Annus groundeth, seeing so many learned men have so demonstratively proved that Fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that, Tatianus the Assyrian, in his Oration against the Greeks, avoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote only three Books dedicated to Antiochus the Successor of Selenus 1. 1.

Nicanor:

Nicanor: but Annus hath devised five Books, wherewith he honoureth Berosus. And whereas Berosus handled onely the estate of the Chaldeans and Affyrans, Annus hath filled this Fragment with the buifness of all the World. And if we may believe Eusebius better than Annus, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Æneas) consumed but 150. years: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Æneas arrival into Italy, there past 1126. (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Janus (who was the first of their Kings) lived at once with Ruth, who married Booz in the Worlds year (as some reckon) 2717. after the Flood 1064. and Noah died 350. years after the Flood: and so there past between Janus of Italy, and Noah furnished Janus 704. years. For Saturnus succeeded Janus, Picus after Saturnus, Fannus after Picus, and Latinius followed Fannus: which Latinius lived at once with Tantanes the 27. King of Affria; with Pelagius of Peloponnesus; with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampson Judge of Israel. Now, all these five Kings of the Latines having consumed but one hundred and fifty years, and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning upwards for one hundred and fifty years, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Janus lived.

True it is, that the Greeks had their Janus; but this was not Noah: so had they Ion the Son of Xuthus, the Son of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Ioners, who were indeed the children of Janus, the fourth Son of Japheth. For the vulgar Translation (where the Hebrew word is Javan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint, Hellas; which is the same. So had they Medus the Son of Medea, whom they make the Parent of the Medes, though they were defended of a far more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third Son of Japheth.

Lastly, we see by a true experience, that the British Language hath remained among us above 2000. years, and the English Speech ever since the invasion of the Angles, and the same continuance have all Nations observed among themselves, though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore it is strange, if either Noah (by them called Janus) had left in Italy his Grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spain, that no plain resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian, (which no time could have quite extinguished) should have been found in the Languages of those Countreys. For which reasons we doubt not but these personal Plantations of Janus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italy, Spain, or France, are merely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the Grecian Janus, which commanded them, and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. years (saith Eusebius) which was in the time of Latinius, the fifth King: which also Saint Augustine and Justine confirm: and this agreeth with reason, time, and possibility. And if this be not sufficient to disprove this vanity, I may out of themselves add thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesta (others Camdens) the wife of this Janus, who instituted the holy Fire of the Vestal Virgins in Rome (the Latines and Romans taking from Janus all their Idolatrous and Heathenish Ceremonies) there is no man so impious, as to believe that Noah himself (who is said by Moses to have walked with God, to be a just man, and whom God of all mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or so wicked and ungrateful, to set up or devise any Heathen, Salvage, or Idolatrous adoration, or have instituted any Ceremony, contrary to that which he knew best pleasing to God himself.

S. VI.

That Gomer also and his Son Togorma of the Posterity of Japheth, were first seated about Asia the Left: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe, and Northward into Sarmatia.

TO turn now to the Sons of Noah, and the Worlds Plantation after the Flood: therein I observe, that as both reason and necessity taught them; so, when they multiplied in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next Countreys bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such manner, as that they might repair to each other, and keep intelligence by River: because the Land was yet Desert, and overprest with Woods, Reeds, Boggs, and rotten Marishes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chush took the South part of Chaldea down the River of Gehon, by which he might pass to and fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: those also, which were of the Race of Shem, inhabiting at Ur, or Orchoa, near the Lakes of Chaldea, might by the same River get up to Babylon, and receive succour from thence. All which Tract of Land upon Gehon Southward, Moses, in the description of Paradise, calleth the Land of Chush: because the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Chushite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that Valley and stayed not in the East) were for a while oppressed, prest, till God afterward by the seed of Abraham made them his own Nation and victorious. Havilah, the brother of Nimrod, and son of Chush, took both Banks of Tygris, especially on the East side of the River: by which River his people might also pass to and fro to Babel.

The Imperial feat of which Region of Havilah or Susian, was antiently called Chusian or Chusan, afterward Susa, Chush himself took the Banks of Gehon, and planted those Countreys West-ward, and Southwest-ward towards Arabia the Stony, and the Desert, where Ptolemy placeth the City of Chusidia, first Chush.

Seba, and Sheba, with the rest that planted Arabia felix, had Tygris, to convey them into the Persian gulf, which wasteth the banks of Arabia felix on the East side: so as those sons of Cush might take Land down the River as they pleased. Also the City of Ninive was by Nimrod founded on the said River of Tygris, and from thence a Colony pass'd to Charran, standing also upon a navigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Japheths sons settle themselves together, and took their seats in Asia the left: from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves Northward, and Westward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it cometh very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal, late down first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palestina and Phenicia: and from thence Gomer, or his children, pass'd on into Asia the left, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines spread themselves into Iberia: and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatia. The first Gomerians, and first Planters in Asia the left, held the Country of the Cymmerians (witness Herodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-Greeks called Galatia, to whom Saint Paul wrote his Epistle fo intitled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the invincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first Plantations) gave names to divers places, as to the Mountains about Albania (called Cymmerius) and to the City of Cymmeris in Phrygia: also Bosphorus Cymmerius took appellation from this Nation, in the out-let whereof was also a City of that name, called Cymmeria: which Pliny saith (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a Town in Campania, so called of the unhealthful waters favouring of Brimstone, which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the Lake

The children of Tubal ranged as far as Iberia, to whom the Moschici were Neighbours, which others write Moschec. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Moschec and Tubal. For these Moschi (which Ptolemy calleth Moschi) inhabit Syracena a Province of Armenia, directly South from the Mountains Moschici, in the Valley between the Mountains Moschici, and the Mountains Paridae: out of whose North part springeth the River Phasis; from the East part Araxis; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Moschec are descended also the Moscovians (saith Melancthon); and it may be, that in process of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Moschec (saith Melancthon) signifieth extension, enlarging or stretching forth. Togorma also at first did inhabit amongst his Parents and Kindred: The Togormians were also called Gibbei, a people neighbouring the Sydomians in Gabala, a Tetrarchy of Phenicia, the same which Pliny calleth Gaben: from whence Solomon had his most excellent Masons, which hewed stones for the Temple of Jerusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the left Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokerta: of which Cities Tigranes, subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hierosylitanus hath planted the Togormians in Sabary; forgetting the prophecy of Ezechiel against the Tyrians: They of the house of Togorma, brought to thy Fairer, Horses, and horsemen, and Mules; which could not well be driven over the whole length of the Mediterranean Sea, but from the neighbour Countreys by land. But Josephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I do not deny, but they might be, in the ensuing ages; and so might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred years after the twelfth of Nimrod's reign. The Jews conceive that the Turks came of those Togormians, because their Emperor is called Togor. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirms, that the Turks descended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Moscovia. But for these subdivisions it were infinit to examine them. Only of the first and second Plantation, and of the first Nations after the Flood, is the matter which I labour to discover; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we must Note, that those grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of less understanding, and had not therefore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations could could be hardly known: only reason hath taught us, that they dwell among the rest, and were covered with the fame of others, who took on them the Conduktion and Dominion over the rest.

From Madai the third son of Japheth, were the Medes. The Greeks bring them (as before) from Medus the son of Medea.

§. VII.

Of Javan, the fourth son of Japheth: and of Mefech of Aram, and Melchec of Japheth.

OF Javan the fourth son of Japheth came the Tones, which were afterwards called the Greeks: and so the Latine and Greek Interpreters for Javan write Greece, as in Elyas: Et milliam ex it' qui salvati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italiam, & Greciam: And I will send those that escape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italy and in Greece. The Geneva here useth the word (Tarfish) for Tarsus, a City in Cilicia, though Tarsis in many places be taken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Geneva use the names Tubal and Javan, and not Italy and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew words. Of the Tones were the Athenians, though themselves dream that they were Aborigines, or men without Ancestors, and growing (as it were) out of the soil itself: who abounding in people, sent Colonies into Asia the less, of whom came the Tones of those parts. Others derive the Athenians from Ion the son of Xuthus, the son of Deucalion; but the antiquity of Javan marring the fashion of that supposition, who so many years preceded Xuthus, Ion or Deucalion. Panjanis tells us that Xuthus stole out of Thessaly with all his Fathers treasure, and his Brothers portions, and arriving at Athens, he was graciously received by Erichon, who gave him his Daughter in marriage; of whom he received two sons, Ion and Achews, the supposed Ancestors of the Athenians: (For Attica was called Ionica, saith Plutarch in the life of Themis;) who, when he had joyned Megara to Attica, erected a Pillar in that Isthmos or Strait, which sailneth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these words: Hec non sunt Peloponnesus, sed Ionia: These Countries are not Peloponnesus, but of Ionia: and on the other side which looketh towards the South, and into Peloponnesus, this: These parts are Peloponnesus, and not Ionia.

Tusny.

Strabo out of Hecataeus affirmeth that the Tones came out of Asia into Greece, which is contrary to the former opinion: That the Tones of Greece transporting certain companies into Asia the less, the name of Tones was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof than he learned of the Greeks themselves, yet I find this conjecture of Hecataeus reasonable enough: For though it were to him unknown, yet sure I am that Asia the less had people before Greece had any: and that Javan did not file from Babylonia into Greece, but took Asia the less in his passage; and from thence past over the nearest way, leaving his own name to some maritime Province out that side, as he did to that part of Greece so called. But yet Strabo himself believed, that Ionica took the name from Ion the son of Xuthus; for so much he had learned from themselves: which was also the opinion of Panjanis. True it is, that the Greeks in after-times cast themselves into that part of Asia the less, opposite unto them, which they held for divers years. And howsoever the Greeks vaunt themselves to be Fathers of Nations; and the most ancient; yet all approved Historians (not their own) deride and disprove their pride and vanity therein. For this dispute of Antiquity (among prophane Writers) rested between the Scythians and the Egyptians, as Justin out of Trogus, in the War between Vexorus of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia witnesseth: which preceded far the reign of Nimrod, and was long before the name of Greece was ever heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cecrops time the Greeks were all Salvages, without Law or Religion; living like brute Beasts in all respects: and Cecrops (saith Saint Augustine) lived together with Moses.

The sixth son of Japheth was Mefech: whom the Septuagint call Mosch (a part of those Nations commanded by Gog the chief Prince of Mefech and Tubal). But this we must remember, that between Mefech the son of Aram, and Mefech (or Mosch) the son of Japheth, there is little difference in name, and both by divers Interpreters diversly written. Montanus, with the Vulgar, writeth Mefech, the son of Aram, Mes; the Geneva, Mosch; Junius, Mefch. But it may be gathered out of the 120. Psalm, that either Mefech the son of Japheth, was the parent of those people, or gave the name to that Province wherein David hid himself: or else (which may rather seem) that it took name from Mefech the son of Aram. For David bewailing his exile (while he lived among a barbarous and irreligious People) with these words: Woe is me that I remain in Mefech, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Junius converteth thus; Ei mihi quia peregrinor

tam diu: habito tanquam Scentie Kedareni: The Septuagint gives it this sense: Woe is me because my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, why dwell with the Inhabitants of Kedar: with which this of the Latine agreeth; Hec mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est, habitavi cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldean otherwise, and in these words: O me miserum, quia peregrinatus sum Asianis, habitavi cum tabernaculis Arabum; O wretch, that I am, for I have travailed among those of Asia: I have dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howsoever or which soever conversion be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Province of Arabia Petrea; and the Chaldean putteth Asia in stead of Mefech, but the Hebrew itself hath Mefech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is most likely, because it answers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) seeing Mefech the son of Aram; 1 Chron. 17. is called Mefech, it is indifferent whether this Nation took name from Mefech or Mefch both bordering Judea, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for so Ezechiel makes Mefech and Tubal. But as for those that take Mefech out of the word Mosch (given by the Septuagint) to be the Muscovian: sure they presume much upon the affinity of names, as aforesaid. Sure I am that David never travelled so far North (for to him Muscovia was utterly unknown) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) he was often in all the time of his persecution: the same being a City on the Mountains of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arim Montanus makes Mosch the Father of the Muscovians: and herein also Melanchton runs with the tide of common opinion, and sets Mefech in Muscovia, though with some better advice of judgment; as, first seated in Cappadocia, and from thence travelling Northward: expounding the places of the 120. Psalm, (Ei mihi quid exulo in Mefech) to signifie, Gentis ejus feritatem insigne esse; That the ferity of that Nation exceeded: which fiercenes or brutality of the Muscovians, David never proved, or (perchance) never heard of. But the same ferity or cruelty which those Northern Muscovians had, may aswell be ascribed to the Arabians and Kedarens. For this Country took name of Kedar the second son of Ismael, of whom a people of equal fiercenes to any of the world were begotten, both in those times and long after, even to this day (if the Arabians, Ismaelites, and Saracens, may be accounted one people.) the same being foretold by the speech of the Angel to Hagar, Gen. 16. v. 12. And he shall be a wilde man: his hand shall be against every man, and every mans hand against him. Now Arabia the Desart (saith Pliny) confronteth the Arabians Cochlei on the East, and the Cedrei Southward, both which joyn together upon the Nabathici. So it appeareth (as before) that Mefech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Magos, neighboured Canaan and Israel, and that Kedar also did joyn to Mefech: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Asia the less, commanded by the successors of Selucus, enemies of the re-establishment of Israel and Juda. But (as I have already said) it might well be, that long after the first Plantation the issue of Mefech (or Mosch) might pass into Cappadocia, and thence into Hircania, and give names both to Mazagani on the one; and to the Mountains Moschici in the other, and from thence might send people more Northerly into Muscovia, and so all opinions faved. But all salvage Nations over-grown and uncultivated, do (for the most part) shew a late Plantation, even as civility, letters, and magnificent building, witness antiquity.

Tyrus, the seventh son of Japheth, which Montanus reckons among the sons of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthy the examination) affirm. Josephus was the first that determined hereof: and because the Scriptures are altogether silent, what part of the World Tyrus peopled, the conjectures are indifferent, and give no ground at all of dispute. It followeth now to speak of the Sons of Gomer, which were three,

Afcanex, Ripharth, and Togorma.

§. VIII.

Of Afcanex and Ripharth, the two elder Sons of Gomer.

Afcanex was the Father of those which the Greeks call Regini, (saith Josephus) but he gives no reason why.

Eusebius makes Afcanex the Father of the Goths. The Jews in their Thargum make him the root of the Germane Nation; but their explications are commonly very idle. Pliny findeth Ascania in Phrygia, near the Rivers of Hilus and Cios: Melanchton being of the same opinion, that the Tuscones were descended of the Afcanex: (for Tuscones, saith he, is as much to say, as of the Afcanex, proposito articulo die Afcanex) and that the word significeth, a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient superstition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombs of Martyrs. Nor far from Phrygia was the Lake Ascania, known by that name in the Romans time. And among the Kings which came to the the succour of Troy, was Afcaneus (Deo finit lis, faith Hom) like unto God: because he was beautifull and strong: for in the same manner doth Virgil grace Aeneas, Or bunne- roque Deo finit; In face and body like one of the gods: Virgil also remembreth such a River, together with the Hills Gargara: as, Il- ludit amor trans Gargara, transque sonantem Afcaneum; Appetite leads them both over the mountains Gargara, and the roaring Afcaneus. But this Pliny maketh more plain in the description of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Brillion upon the River Afcaneus, which is adjoining to Myfia, and is near the border of the Trojan Empire: and the Lake Afcaneus he directs us to find by the description of Phrygia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lyeth farr within the Countreys of Bithynia: and then from Prusia to Nicea are accounted 25. miles, in which way this Lake lieth, even between Prusia and Nicea. And so Junius (as I conceive him) takes them of Afcaneus, to be the Inhabitants of Pontus and Bithynia, and those North parts of Asia. Stephanus de Urbibus makes it a City of Troas, built by Afcaneus the Son of Aeneas: saying, that there was another of that name in Myfia. Of Afcaneus a Lake of Bithynia, Ptolemy witnesseth: and Strabo giveth Afcaneus both a Lake, a River, and a Town in Myfia, near unto Cio; which also agreeth with Pliny. For Pliny findeth Prusia (before spoken of) near Cio, and calleth the Islands before Troy, Afcaneus.

Now, whether these places took name of Afcaneus the Son of Gomer, or of Afcaneus the Son of Aeneas, it might be questioned: sure it is, that Afcaneus which brought succour to the Trojans, could not take his name from Aeneas Son, who was then either exceeding young, or rather unborn: and it seemeth that the Countreys whence those succours came, were not out of any part of Phrygia, or Myfia, but farther off, and from the North parts of all Asia the less, which by Hieremy is called Afcaneus, by the figure synecdoche, as Junius thinketh. Out of those testimonies therefore which deceive not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Hieremy we shall learn of what Nation the Afcaneus were, whose words are these: Set up a Standard in the Land, blow the Trumpet among the Nations against her, call up the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Afcaneus, against her, &c. meaning, against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most Interpreters consent, fo called of the Mountains of Ararat which run through it: Minni, the lesser Armenia; Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name (faith Junius and others before him:) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phenicia, and Palestina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a Province of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the Story of Jacob and Elsan, and call it Aram-Padan. Then if these two Nations were of the Armenians, and Afcaneus joyined with them (who altogether united under Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoil of the Babylonian Empire) we shall erre much to call Afcaneus Germany, or Almain: for we hear of no swart Rutters at that siege. But the Afcaneus were of those Nations which were either subject or allied to the Medes: of which if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the disperison of Nations was in after-times without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Josephus, who calls them Rhegins; or of the Jews, who will have them to be Almains; when they confirm it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will think as they do.

Of Riphab, the second Son of Gomer, there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Be- roaldus and Peterinus think that he wandered farr off from the rest of his Brothers, and therefore no memory of his Plantation. But I see nothing to the contrary, but that he might seat himself with the rest of his Family: for there wanted no room or soil in those days for all the Sons and Grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well understood, that the Riphei were of Riphab, which the Greeks afterward (according to Josephus) called the Paphlagonians: and Riphei (faith Melancthon) signifieth Giants. These people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the most of number and power among those, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti. The greatest number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who spake the ancient Polac: which being first called Riphei (for the love of some of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names, and became Heneti (a custom exceeding common in those times) and dwelt first in Paphlagonia, as Hom witnesseth, and so doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when these Riphei (afterward Heneti) fought new Regions, they came along the shores of Euxinus, and filled the North-part of Europe, containing Russia, Lithuania, and Polonia. From thence they crost thwart the Land, and peopled Illyria, detestous (faith Melancthon) of a warmer soil of Fruit and Wine. These Heneti, or Veneti, whom Melancthon taketh to be one people, filled all the Land between the Baltick and Adriatick

Adriatick Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulf Venedicus is found in Russia. This Nation, after they were posselt of Lithuania and Polonia, disturbed the Plantation of the Boii and Hermunduri. Therefore it seemeth to me, that of Riphab, came the Riphei, afterward Heneti; and so thinketh Arias Montanus, first seated in Paphlagonia, but in course of time, Lords of Sarmatia, and those other parts before remembered, chiefly between the Rivers of Vistula and Albis. The name (faith Melancthon) signifieth wandering, or wanderers, or Nomades: a people which lived by White-meats and Fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the first Ages.

Of the third Son of Gomer, Togorma, I have spoken already; now therefore of Javans children, which were four:

Elija, Tharfis, Cethim, Dodonim.

Of the four Sons of Javan: and of the double signification of Tharfis, either for a proper Name, or for the Sea.

OF Elija, or Elipha, came the Zoles: and of this Elija, all the Greeks were called Hellenes, faith Montanus. Melancthon makes Elija the Father of the Zoles in Asia side: others of Elis in Peloponnesus; or of both. And seeing the Greeks were descended in general of Javan, it is probable that Zoles and the Elei, took name of Elija his eldest Son. Ezechiel in the 27. Chap. speaking of Tyre, nameth the Isles of Elija, Hyacinthus, & purpure de insulis Elije facta sunt operimentum tuium: Blue Silk and purple, brought from the Isles of Elija, was their covering. The Chaldeans for Elija, write Italia: but the Pulgar, the Tigruine, the Geneva, and Junius, keep the word Elija: and so I think they might do with reason. For there was not found any such Purple-Dye in Italy in those days, nor since; that I can read of: but those Isles of Elija, were by a better conjecture the Isles of Greece; and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it self: and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the Coast of Genulia.

Tharfis, the second Son of Javan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharfis is the Metropolis. Montanus, for Tharfis in Cilicia, understands Carthage in Africa; but (referring the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that conjecture. The Chaldean Paraphrasts puts Carthage for Tharfis, but it hath no authority nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the Ships of Solomon went every three years to Tharfis, and brought thence Gold, Silver, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldean Paraphrast translates Tharfis for Africa. But Solomon's Ships were prepared in the Red-Sea at Esfon-Gaber, in the Bay of Elana, near unto Madagasc, where Jethro (Moses Father-in-law) inhabited: a Province of Arabia Petrea, Jadmaea, or of the Chabites; and they failed to the higher part of the East-India. For it had been a strange Navigation to have spent three years in the passage between Judea and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might have been failed in six or ten days. And if so great riches might have been found within the bounds of the Mediterranean Sea, all the other neighbouring Princes would soon have entertained that Trade also. But this enterprise of Solomon is in this sort written of, in the first of Kings: Also King Solomon made a Navie of Ships in Elion-Gaber, which is beside Elath, and the brink of the Red-Sea in the Land of Edom: and Hiram sent with the Navie his servants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the servants of Solomon: and they came to Ophir, and set from thence 420. Talents of gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the World like unto their own, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that only (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word used for the Sea in general) so, because the Israelites and the Phenicians knew no other Sea than that of the Mediterranean in the beginning; and that the people of Tharfis had the greatest Ships, and were the first Navigators in those parts with such Vessels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharfis used often for the Sea. And whereas it is said that the Ships of Solomon went every three years to Tharfis, that phrase is not strange at all; for we use it ordinarily whereforever we navigate, (namely) that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea; or that they are set out every year, or every three years to the Sea, and therefore Tharfis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but used for the Sea it self. But in this place, Tharfis is truly taken for Tharfis, the chief City in Cilicia; founded by Tharfis, the second Son of Javan, or by his Successors in memory of their first Parent. To this City arrived Alexander Macedon, before he gave the first overthrow to Darius, and calling himself into the River to bathe and wash his body, he fell into an extreme Fever, and great danger of death: and in this City of Tharfis was S. Paul born. Now, this agreeth with the reason and nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other Sons inhabiting Asia the less, and that part of Syria adjoining Javan, who was to pass over the Sea into Greece, took the edge of the same Coast, and first planted the Iones on that shore: gave the Islands between Asia the less and Greece to Elisa, and left Tharbis upon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of whom that City took name.

The third Son of Javan was Cethim, of whom were the Romans and Italians, saith Beroaldus, but I allow better of Melancthon's opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plural (saith he) and signifies percussors, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Isai. 23. (according to Melancthon) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hæc calamitas ab Elai prædicta est, qui capite vicefimo tertio inquit, venturos esse everiores Tyri ex terra Citim; This calamity (saith Melancthon) was foretold by Elai the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the destroyers of Tyre were come out of Citim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, which came to them by Sea, and separate from the Continent; and so also Citim might be taken for Italy, saith Beroaldus; yet we must take the first performance of the former Prophecie which took effect by the destruction of the Tyrrians by Alexander, who, after seven Months siege, entered that proud City, and cut in pieces eleven thousand principal Citizens; strangled two thousand, and changed the freedom of thirteen thousand others into bondage and slavery. Now, that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it doth appear plainly in the first of the Maschabees, in these words: After that Alexander the Macedonian, the Son of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and Medes, slew Darius King of the Persians, and Medes. Josephus sets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (saith he) there remaineth the City Citim, the Country of Zeno the Philosopher (witness Laertius); which City Ptolemy upon Eschiel affirmeth, that it stood in S. Hieronymus time. So it may be that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrews were called the Islands of Cethim; and in that sense might Cyprus be so called also; and yet, because Tharbis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly over against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharbis: and finding that Island too straight for his people, after they were increased, and that the rest of the Coasts, both in Asia and Greece, were inhabited by his Father and brothers, he sent Colonies over the Aegean Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodonim the fourth Son of Javan, and the youngest brother (by the most opinions) late down at Rhodes, as near Cethim, Tharbis, and Elisa, as he could. For Dodonim and Rhodanum are used indifferently by many. Translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so alike, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebrews affirm. There is also found in Epirus the City of Dodona, in the Province of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted soil in Cyprus: so Dodonim (seated in a far less Island) did of necessity send his people farther off, and keeping alongst the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elisa, he passed a little further on the Westward, and planted in Epirus. And though the City of Dodona was not then built (or perchance not so ancient as Dodonim himself) yet his posterity might give it that name in the memory of their first Parent, as it happened all the World over. For names were given to Cities, Mountains, Rivers, and Provinces, after the names of Noah's children, and grand-children; not in all places by themselves, but by their successors many years after: every of their Families being desirous to retain among them, by those memories, out of what branch themselves were taken and grafted else-where. And because great Kingdoms were often by new Conquerors newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished, therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gave their own names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountains and Rivers, as to things (after their judgments) freest from any alteration.

Thus then did Javan settle himself and his children in the edge and frontier of Asia the less, towards the Sea-shore: and afterwards in Greece, and the Islands and neighbour Provinces thereof, as Japheth their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Javan's brethren, Gomer, Mogog, Madai, Tubal, Mesech, and the rest, round about him. And in like sort did Chush (the Son of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldaea, and the borders thereof towards the West and South-west: and the Sons of Chush (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it self) travelled Southward in Arabia felix, and South-westward into Arabia Petraea: the rest of his children holding the Regions adjoining to Nimrod, Mizraim the brother of Chush in like manner took the way of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palestina adjoining. The Sons of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to those of the Sons of Shem, which spread themselves towards towards the West, and the borders of the Mediterranean Sea: of which I shall speak hereafter. But first of the Sons of Cham or Ham; which were four:

Chush, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

That the seat of Chush the eldest Son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia; and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scriptures, grounded on the mistaking of this point.

§. I.

Of Josephus his Tale of an Ethiopian's Wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chush.

That Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalm, vers. 51. Then Israel came to Egypt, and Jacob was a stranger in the Land of Ham; and in the 78. Psalm, He slew all the first-born in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also found a great City in Thebaid, called Cherane (as it were) the City of Ham of which name Herodotus also discovers an Island in the same Region. But because Chush is the elder Son of Ham, it agreeth with order to speak first of him. Now, though I have already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proved that Chush could not be Ethiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turn to speak for himself, I will add some further proof to the former. For, the manifestation hereof sets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senseless interpretations. Surely, howsoever the Septuagint and Josephus have here failed, that Chush could not be Ethiopia, but Arabia (to wit) both that Arabia called Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Happy and the Desert: which Regions Chush and the Chushites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first fate down altogether. And there is nothing which so well cleareth the Controversie, as the true interpretation of the place, Numb. 12. vers. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chushite; together with some places which speak of Nebuchodonozor's Conquests. For whereas Josephus and the Septuagint in the place Numb. 12. vers. 1. as also else-where, understand Chush for Ethiopia, we must give credit to Moses himself herein; and then it will appear that Josephus was grossly mistaken, or vainly led by his own invention. For Josephus, presuming that Chush was Ethiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Numb. 12. vers. 1. is called a Woman of Chush) was a Woman of the Land of Ethiopia, imagineth that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Ethiopia, fell in love with the person and fame of Moses; while he besieged Saba her Father's City; and to the end, to obtain Moses for her Husband, she practised to betray both her Parents, Country, and Friends, with the City it self, and to deliver it into Moses hands: The Tale (if it be worth the reciting) lieth thus in Josephus. And after he hath described the strength of the Ethiopian City Aster, which he saith at length Chambyss called to be from the name of his Sister (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic cum Moses residere exercitum ostium egre ferret, hoste non audente manus conscire, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Ethiopum Regis filia nomine Tharbis, &c. which Tale hath this sense in English: When Moses was griev'd that his Army lay idle, because the Enemy besieged durst not sally and come to hand-to-hand, there happened this accident in the mean while: The Ethiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, who at some assault given, beheld the person of Moses, and withal admired his valour. And knowing that Moses had not only up-held and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Ethiopians to the very brink of subversion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her own affection, which daily increased, she made means to send unto him by one of her trustiest servants, to offer her self unto him, and become his Wife; which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliver the City into his possession; whereupon the Condescending, and Moses having taken oath to perform this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

§. II.

A Dispute against the Tale of Josephus.

His Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Josephus fashioned, and therein also utterly mistaken himself, in naming a City of Arabia for a City of Ethiopia: as he names Ethiopia it self to have been the Country of Moses his Wife, when (indeed) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Ethiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and modern, teach us, saying, that the Sabeans are Arabians, and not Ethiopians; except Josephus can can persuade us, that the Queen of Saba, which came from the South to hear the Wisdom of Solomon, were a Negro, or Black-Moor. And though Damianus à Goes speak of certain Letters to the King of Portugal from Prester John, of the Abissines: wherein that Ethiopian King would persuade the Portuguese, that he was defended of the Queen of Saba, and of Solomon; yet it doth no where appear in the Scriptures, that Solomon had any Son by that great Princess: which had it been true, it is likely that when Sihab King of Egypt invaded Roboam, and sackt Hierusalem, his Brother (the Son of Saba, and Solomon) who joyned upon Egypt, would both have impeached that enterprize, as also given aid and succour to Roboam against Jeroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelve Tribes to his own obedience. Neither is it any thing against our Opinion of Moses his Wife, to have been an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach us, that Moses married the Daughter of Jethro, Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North-coast of the Red-Sea, over against the body of Egypt, and near Eilon-Gaber, where Solomon provided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red-Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Idumaea joyneth to the Tribe of Yuda by the North; to Arabia Petraea, by the East; to the Mediterrane, by the West; and to the Red-Sea, by the South-east. And if we mark the way which Moses took when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appear that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia itself, he had formerly lived forty years; where it seemeth, that besides his careful bringing up in Egypt, he was instructed by Jethro in the Egyptians learning. For Josephus confesseth, and S. Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the Wisdom of the Egyptians. But on the other side, this Text makes much against Josephus, where it is written in Exodus the second, Therefore Moses fled from Pharaoh, and dwelt in the Land of Midian or Midian, and not in Ethiopia. And in the third Chapter, it is as plain as words can express, in what Region Midian was, where it is written, When Moses kept the Sheep of Jethro his Father-in-law, Priest of Midian, and drove the Flock to the Desert, and came to the mountain of God in Horeb. Now, that Mount Horeb is not in Ethiopia, every infant knoweth. And if we may believe Moses himself, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Josephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Country and friends) neither had she the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was she a Negro, but a Madianite. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest means: so it pleased him from a Shepherd to call Moses, and after him David, and by them to deliver his People first and last. For Moses sitting by a Well (as disconsolate, and a stranger) defended the Daughters of Reuel from the other Shepherds, and drew them Water to water their Sheep: upon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Jethro, whose Daughter he married, and not for any betraying of Towns or Countreys.

From hence also came Jethro to Moses at Rephidim, not far from Idumaea, and finding the insupportable government of such a multitude, he advised him to distribute this weighty charge, and to make Governours and Judges of every Tribe and Family. And if Jethro had been an Ethiopian, it had been a far progress for him to have passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to have found Moses in the border of Idumaea: the Egyptians hating Moses, and all that favoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petraea (which joyneth to Madian) proveth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts, in which the second time he wandered forty years, and did by these late travels of his, seek to instruct the Children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty and rest. For he found them nourished up with the milk of Idolatry, and obstinate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that those stiff Plants could not be bowed or declined, either by persuasion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Deserts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from those he might receive fruit, agreeable to his own desire, and Gods Commandments.

Lastly, this Opinion of Josephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrysamenis, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who allowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sephora. His own words have this beginning: *Mentitur etiam Apollinaris duas uxores habuisse Moysen, &c. Apollinaris alio iure, in affirmantibus Moysen habuisse duas uxores, et alio doctus non perceperit ista seignia per se, sed in manifestum, quod etiam Moyses uxorem Lephoram, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Ethiopia beyond Egypt; being the same that joyneth to Arabia: So farr Chrysamenis.*

|| III.

Chusil ill expounded for Ethiopia, Ezechiel 29. 10.

Now, as Chusil is by the Septuagint converted Ethiopia, and the Wife of Moses therefore called Ethiopia: so in the conquest of Nebuchodonosor is Ethiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezechiel, it is manifest that Nebuchodonosor was never in Ethiopia. Behold (saith Ezechiel, speaking of the person of this great Assyrian) I come upon thee and upon thy Rivers, and I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate, from the Tower of Seveneh, even to the borders of the Black-Moors: which last words should have been thus converted: From the Tower Seveneh, to the borders of the Chusites, or Arabians, between which two is situated all Egypt. For to say, from the borders of Seveneh to the Ethiopians, hath no fence at all, Seveneh it self being the border of Egypt, confronting and joyning to Ethiopia, or the Land of the Black-Moors. So as if Nebuchodonosor conquest had been but between Seveneh and the border of Ethiopia, it were as much to say, and did express no other victory than the conquest of all that Land and Country, lying between Middlesex and Buckingham, where both the Countries joyn together; or all the North parts of England between Barrick, and Scotland: for this hath the same fence with the former, if any man sought to express by these two bounds, the Conquest of England: Barrick being the North border of England, as Seveneh or Syena is the South bound of Egypt, seated in Thebaide, which toucheth Ethiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nebuchodonosor never entred into any part of Ethiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneveans, and all other (in effect) have written Ethiopia for Chusil.

|| IV.

Another place of Ezechiel, Chap. 30. Vers. 9. in the like manner mistaken.

And as the former, so is this place of Ezechiel mistaken, by being in this sort converted: In die illa egredientur nuncios a facie mea in triibus ad conterendos Ethiopiae confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in English by the Geneveans: In that day shall their messengers go forth from me in ships to make the careless Moors afraid. Now, the Latin for (ships) hath the Greek word Trieres for Trieres, which are Gallies of three banks, and not ships. But that in this place the Translation should have been (as in the former) amended by using the word Chusil, or Arabia, for Ethiopia, or the Black-Moors, every man may see which meanly understandeth the Geography of the World, knowing, that to pass out of Egypt into Ethiopia, there need no Gallies or Ships, no more than to pass out of Northampton into Leicester-shire: Ethiopia being the conteminate Region with Egypt, and not divided so much as by a River. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Egypt Nebuchodonosor should send Gallies along the Coast of the Red-Sea, by which an Army might be transported into Arabia the Happy and the Stony (sparing the long wearisome march over all Egypt, and the Desert of Pharan) which Army might thereby surprize them unawares in their security and confidence. For when Nebuchodonosor was at Seveneh within a mile of Ethiopia, he needed neither Gally nor Ship to pass into it; being all one large and firm Land with Egypt, and no otherwise parted from it, than one In-land shire is parted from another: and if he had a fancy to have rowed up the River but for pleasure, he could not have done it; for the fall of Nilus (rumbling over high and steepy Mountains) called Catadupe Nilus, were at hand.

Lastly, I have already observed, the Sons of every Father feared themselves as near together as possibly they could; Gomer and his Sons in Asia the less; Javan and his Sons in Greece, and the Islands adjoining; Shem in Persia and Eastward. So the sons and grandchildren of Chusil from the River of Gehon (their Fathers first seat) inhabited upon the same, or upon some other contiguous unto it, as Nimrod and Havilah on the one side, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude, in a word, the Hebrews had never acquaintance or fellowship, any war, treaty of peace, or other intelligence with the Ethiopian Black-Moors, as is already remembred in the Chapter of Paradise.

|| V.

A place, Elay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chusil for Ethiopia.

And as in these places before remembred, so in divers others is the word Ethiopia put for Arabia, or Chusil, which puts the Story (where it is so understood) quite out of square; one Kingdom thereby being taken for another. For what fence hath this part of Scripture, Isai. 18. Ve terra Cymbalorum alarum rum que est trans flumina Æthiopiæ; or, according to the Septuagint, in these words: Pæ terra navium alarum que est trans fluvios Æthiopiæ; Wo to the Land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia, sending Embassadors by Sea, even the Vessels of Reeds upon the waters. Pæ terra umbræ ore; Wo to the Land of the shady coast, saith Junius. The former Translators understand it in this sense; That the waters are shadowed with the sails, which are significantly called the wings of the ships; the other, that the coast of the Sea was shadowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpose: That this Land here spoken of by the Prophet Isaiab, is Egypt, no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that sent this Message to the former Translation, every man may see the transposition of Kingdoms: for hereby Egypt is transported unto the other side of Æthiopia, and Æthiopia set next unto Judæa; when it is the Land of Chush and Arabia; indeed that lieth between Judæa and Egypt, and not Æthiopia, which is seated under the Equinoctial Line. And of this, Beroaldus alketh a material question (to wit) what Region that should be, of which the Prophet speaketh, and placeth it beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia; Nam de ignota aq. regione dici nequit. For it cannot be said that he treateth of an unknown Region. Now, if Æthiopia itself be under the Equinoctial line, with whom the Jews had never any acquaintance, why should any man dream that they had knowledge of Nations far beyond it again, and beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia? except we shall impiously think that the Prophet spake he knew not what, or used an impertinent discourse of those Nations, which were not discovered in 2000. years after, inhabiting as far South as the Cape of Good Hope, commonly known by the name of Bona esperanza.

¶ V I.

That upon the like mistaking, both Terrhaca in the Story of Senacherib, and Zera in the Story of Asa; are unavoidably made Æthiopians.

And by this Translation is the Story of Senacherib utterly mistaken in the cause of his retreat. For Senacherib was first repulsed at Pelissum, at the very entrance of Egypt from Judæa: when having certain knowledge that Thirrhaca (which all the Interpreters called King of Æthiopia) was on the way to set on him, he began to withdraw himself: and fearing to leave his Army in two parts, he sent threatening Messengers to Ezechia King of Judæa, perwading him to submit himself: the Tenor whereof is set down in the second of Kings in these words: Have any of the gods of the Nations delivered his Land out of the hands of the King of Assur? Where is the god of Hamah, &c. By which proud Embassage, if he had obtained entrance into Jerusalem, he then meant to have united that great Army before Jerusalem, commanded by Rabsakeh, with the other which lay before Pelissum, a great City upon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already mastered the most part of all those Cities in Judæa and Benjamin, with a third Army (which himself commanded), being then at the siege of Lebna. But upon the rumor of that Arabian Army led by the King Thirrhakeh (whom Josephus calls Tharkeer) Rabsakeh halted from the siege of Hiernsalem, and found Senacherib departed from Lachis, and set down before Lebna, which, was afterwards called Eleutheropolis, as some have supposed. But while he had ill success at Pelissum, and feared Thirrhakeh, God himself, whom he least feared, strook his Army before Hiernsalem by the Angel of his power, so as 158000. were found dead in the place, as in the life of Ezechia is hereafter more largely written. And that this Army of Thirrhakeh was from Arabia, Josephus himself makes it plain. For he contendeth in the tenth Book, the first Chapter of the Jews Antiquities, that it was come to Senacherib knowledge, that the Army which was afoot (both to relieve the Egyptians and the Jews) marched towards him by the way of the Desert: Now, the Desert which lay indifferent between Hiernsalem and Pelissum, was that of Pharan or Sur, which also toucheth on the three Arabia's, to wit, the Story, of which it is a part; the Desert, and the Happy; and by no other way indeed could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelissum or Hiernsalem. But that there is any Desert between Pelissum and the South part of Egypt, hath never yet been heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this description of the second of Kings, Vers. 6. hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word (Chush) is also translated Æthiopia; and in this sense have all the Interpreters (but Junius) expressed the beginning of the ninth Verse: He heard also when Asa of Thirrhakeh King of Æthiopia, &c. whereas it should have been thus converted with Junius: Audens autem de Thirrhakeh Rege Chushis, He heard also of Thirrhakeh King of the Chushites. For they were the Chushites and Arabians, whole whose Houses and Cities were next the fire, and upon whom the very smother of Judæa flaming was blown, being their nearest Neighbours: and so were not the Æthiopian Black-Moors under the Equinoctial, whom neither War nor Peace (which discovereth all Regions) ever found out, saith Pliny. For this King was no more King of Æthiopia than Zerah was, who invaded Asa King of Judæa, with an Army of a Million, and three thousand Chariots. Indeed, how such an Army, and those Chariots should pass through all Egypt (the Kings of Egypt being mighty Kings) let all men that know how these Regions are seated, and how far distant, judge. For Princes do not easily permit Armies of a Million to run through them; neither was there ever such strength of Black-Moors heard of in that part of the World, or elsewhere. Neither are these Æthiopians; such Travellers or Conquerors; and yet is this King Zerah also called King of Æthiopia. But the word Chush being first so converted for Æthiopia, the rest of the Interpreters (not looking into the seats of Kingdoms, or the possibilities of attempts, or invasions) followed one another in the former mistakings.

A further Exposition of the place, Esai. 18. 1.

Concerning these words in that eighteenth Chapter of Esay, Navium alarum, Winged Ships (so the Septuagint turn it) or Cymbalo alarum (according to the Latine) Sails whistling in the winds, or terre umbræ ore (after Junius) the Land of a shadowed coast, or the Land shadowing with wings, as our English Geneva hath it. The two first interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hierom, have one sense in effect. For the sails are commonly called the wings of a Ship; and we use to say ordinarily when our Ships sails slowly, that the wanteth wings (that is) when her sails are either worn, or too narrow: and we also use the same phrase of the wind whistling in the sails. And it may be that the Egyptians employed so many of those small ships, as their sails were said to give a shadow over the Red-Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (upon Isaiab) affirmeth, that the word (Sabal) doth signify both to shadow, and to gingle (which is) to make a kind of Cymbaline sound: so as the meaning of this place (saith Pintus) is this: Wo to thee, O Egypt, which dost promise to others safeguard, under the shadow of thy wings: which (indeed) seemeth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Isaiab: and this phrase is often else-where used, as in the 16. Psalm: Sub umbra alarum tuarum protege me; Defend me under the shadow of thy wings. The Boats of Reed (spoken of are of two kinds; either of basker Willow covered with hides (as anciently in Britain) or a Tree made hollow in the bottom, and built up on both sides with Canes. Of the one sort I have seen in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

§. X I.

Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Egypt.

¶ I.

That Mizraim the chief Planter of Egypt: and the rest of the Sons of Ham, were seated in order one by another.

The second Son of Ham was Mizraim; who (according to the place of a second brother) was sent somewhat farther off to inhabit. For Chush first possit Chaldea on the West side of Gebon chiefly: and from thence, as he increased in people, so he entered Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red-Sea, and to the South-east side of Judæa. Mizraim his brother (with Phut) past over into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt; and Phut (as a third brother) was thrust farther off into Mauritania. Canaan took the Sea-coast, and held the side of Palestina: and these four brothers possit all that Tract of Land, from Gebon in Chaldea, as far to the West as the Mediterranean Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deserta, and Petrea, all Canaan which embraceth Galilea, Samarita, and Judæa; with the two Egypts, whereof the neather is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterranean Sea on the North: and Thebaida (called the upper Egypt) stretcheth it self toward the South as far as Syene, the border of the Æthiopians, or Black-Moors. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward, Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other Nation or Family that dwelt between them. And in the same manner did all their Sons again, and all the Sons of the rest of Noah children, fort themselves.

¶ II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be known: and of the Egyptians Lunar years, which made their Antiquities seem more fabulous.

This flourishing Kingdom possit by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and and became Egypt, at such time as Aegyptus (otherwise Rameses, as some think) the son of Belus, chased thence his elder brother Danau, shifting him into that part of Greece, now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made *Dana*i, abandoning their proper names: which happened 877. years after the Flood, in the time of Jofua, as Saint Augustine conjectureth out of Eusebius. But in Homer's Odyssey it appeareth that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Trojan War. And before this, Egypt was known by divers other names, as Oceana, Avia, Ofritana, &c. And Manethon (whom Josephus citeth in his first Book against Apion) numbeth all the Kings of Egypt after Moses departure, who consumed 393. years. By which other men conjecture, that the Egyptians took on them that name, 330. years after Jofua, and about 1000. years after the Flood. But where Josephus in the same Book taketh Isael to be those Hycos, which he also calleth Pafiores, or Shepherds, which are said to have reigned in Egypt 511. years: whom also he calleth his Ancestors (meaning the Ancestors of the Jews): in this I am sure he was grossly deceived, or that he vainly boasted: for the Israe'lites had no such Dominion as Manethon saitheth, nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many years.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod., Sticulus, Metela, and others. For they affirm (saith Pomp. Metela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amasis, who was contemporary with Cyrus; and that they had Memory and Story of 13000. years; and that the Stars had four times changed their course, and the Sun twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rise among the Athenians and Arcadians, who dare affirm, that they are more ancient than Jupiter and the Moon; whereof Ovid:

Arcades: & Luna gens prior illa fuit.*

The Arcadians the Earth inhabited Ere yet the Moon did shine, or Jove was bred.

But for those 13000. years, it may well be true; seeing it is certain that the Egyptians reckon their years by Moneths, which makes after that account not above 1000. or 1100. years, whether we take their Moneths or Lunary years to have been of the first kind of 27. days and eight hours; or otherwise 29. days and twelve hours; or after any other of those five diversities of their Lunary years.

||. III.

Of certain vain assertions of the Antiquity of the Egyptians.

Gerardus Mercator, in his Chronologie, reasoneth for the Egyptians Antiquity in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynasty (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the general Flood; and that therefore the first of the other fifteen reached the Creation, or soon after it. To which conjecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer; That therein Mercator was first deceived, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty was at once with the general Flood: which Eusebius maketh 292. years after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the Shepherds Dynasty (being in number 17.) in the time of their first King, Salis, to have been in the year of the World 1846. which Eusebius findeth in the Worlds Age 2140. For the 16. Dynasty was begun but in the 292. year after the Flood, as they account, and continued 190. years. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh every Dynasty to endure 115. years, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at less than 100. years: for the 28. had but fix years, the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. years.

Now, Annus in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. years: and that the first of the 15. began but in the 131. year after the Flood: so as where Mercator maketh all the 15. to precede the Flood, and the 16. to have been then in being at the time of the Flood, Annus makes them all after it. But the contrariety of falsehood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annus had forgotten his former Opinion and Assertion, that it was in the 131. year that Nimrod, with the Sons of Noah, came into the Valley of Shinar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor far-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conveyed Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spain, in the tenth year of Nimrod's reign (which was ten years after his arrival into Babylonia) yet herein he is more unadvised. For he makes Egypt possit, and a Government established in the very first year of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinar, before all partition, or any expedition far off, or near, in question: for, from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

||. IV.

||. IV.

Against Pererius: that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200. years after the Creation; at least, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Flood.

BUT whereas Pererius seeketh to overthrow this Antiquity of the Egyptians throwing their Dynasties (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I do not find any great strength in this Opinion of Pererius (to wit) that it was either unlikely or impossible that Egypt should be peopled within 100. or 200. years after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the general Flood, I do verily believe the contrary: and that not only of Egypt, but the better part of all the World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these: Quomodo enim primos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles addid multiplicari potuit, ut ad Egyptum usque habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred years of the World, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Egypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) we must also confess, that there were then both the Assyrians and other Nations.

Now, seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our saving-belief, it is lawfull for every man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I do not gain say any mans opinion out of any crossing or cavelling humours: for I think it the part of every Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibility of union, than out of froward subtilty, and pre-judicate resolvedness, to maintain factions needless, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore, for this Opinion, that Egypt was not planted so soon after Adam, no, not at all before the Flood, I say, that there is no reason why we should give a less increase to the Sons of Adam, than to the Sons of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the Flood double, and (after a few years) treble, is an infallible proof of their strength and ability, to beget many Children: and at that time, they observed no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinity. And that there was a speedy increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appear by this, that Cain, who (being fearful that the death of Abel would have been revenged on him) withdrew himself from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there, by the help of his own issues, built a City (called Enoch) after the name of his first-born. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinar with so many multitudes as sufficed to build the City and Tower of Babel: and that to this increase there was given but 130. years by Berosus, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly understood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phaleg) but one hundred and one year: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the Infancy of the first Age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, even within 130. years the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so within 70. years after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200. years) as well Assyria, Syria, and Egypt might be possit before the Flood, as they were within the same or less time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance or true Story of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which we increased in the first 100. or 130. years after the Flood, came into Shinar and Babylonia. For, that ever Noah himself came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authority to prove it, so all probable conjecture and reason it self denies it. Again; those multitudes and powerfull numbers which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her own Army of three millions (and she left not all her Kingdoms empty) do well prove, that if the World had such plenty of people in so few years after the Flood; it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their own account, Nimrod governed Babylonia and Assyria but 292. years after the Flood of Noah. And these Troops of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Eastern Kingdoms, from Media to the Mediterranean Sea; when there had now past from the Flood to the time of this her invasion somewhat less or more than 360. years: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confess, that in respect of the strange greatness of Semiramis Army; and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be given. And if but one half be true of that which is said, That her Army consisted of 1300000. Footmen, and 500000. Horse-men, it must needs be, that long before Semiramis Reign, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Army was gathered) was full of people: yea, Arabia itself (much part whereof is barren)

must long before this time of Semiramis, have been plentifully peopled; when Ninus having a determination to make himself Master of all Nations, entred (notwithstanding) in league with the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or sought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Egypt might also be peopled. Now, if we may believe Trogus Pompeius (Epitomiz'd by Justin) Egypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was born. For these be his own words, speaking of Ninus: Fuere quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexoris Rex Egypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanais King of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Pontus, the other Egypt. And how full of people all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Ninus witness, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterward the Babylonians; yea, all that whole body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numb'reth the Armies wherewith Ninus invaded Zoraster, at 1700000. Foot-men, and 200000. Horse-men: and the Stories generally shew, that though Zoraster's Army was far short of this, yet it was greater than any that those parts of the World ever since beheld. But to what end should I seek for foreign Authority? for no man doubteth, but that Egypt was possessed by Misraim, the Son of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdom, filled with many Cities in Abraham's time, the Scriptures tell us. And sure, to prepare and cultivate a desolate and overgrown ground, to beautify it with many Cities, Laws, and Policies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few days: and therefore it must be inhabited in a less time than 200. years after the Flood; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Flood. For if so many millions of men were found within 300. years after the general Flood; so as not only Babylon, and Assyria, Babylonia, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Palestina, yea, the far-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those Nations be compass'd, which 1656. years brought forth before the Flood? even necessity, which cannot be refuted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the known World; especially, where death forbore the Father, and made no place for the Son, till he had beheld living Nations of his own body.

§. V.

Of some other Reasons against the Opinion of Pererius.

For what a strange increase did the long lives of the first Age make, when they continued 800. or 900. years? Surely we have reason to doubt, that the World could not contain them, rather than they were not spread over the World. For let us now reckon the date of our lives in the Age of the World: wherein if one exceed 50. years, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we find no want of people; nay, we know the multitude such, as if by Wars, or Pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the Earth, with all the industry of man, could not give them food. What strange heaps then of Souls had the first Ages, who enjoyed 800. or 900. years, as aforesaid? These numbers, I say, cannot be counted nor conceived. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which have been born in Brittain since three or four hundred years before the Norman Conquest (saying such as by accident, or by violence were cut off) were now alive; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamy might have been increased. For (to omit, that the Giants and mighty Ones of the first Age observed no Law of Matrimony) it is to be thought, that those Lovers of the World and of Pleasure, when they knew the long and liberal time which nature had given them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could fly from, or eschew. For what humane argument hath better persuasion to make men careless of life, and fearless of death, than the little time which keeps them asunder, and that short time also accompanied with so many pains and diseases, which this envious old Age of the World mingleth together, and loweth with the seeds of Mankind?

Now, if that Berosus or Annius may be acknowledged for sufficient Authours, whom Pererius himself in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Josephus confirmed, that the City of Enoch was seated near Libanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cain's time, I see no cause why Palestina (which is also a Province of Syria) and Egypt (which neighboureth it) could be left desolate both all the life-time of Cain, and all those times between his death and the Flood, which were by estimation 700. or 800. years. And sure, though this fragment of Berosus with Annius his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to be rejected. Therefore S. Hierome, for such Authours gives a good rule: Bona eorum eligamus, vitiosa contraria; Let us choose what is good in them, and reject the rest. And certainly, in the very beginning of the first Book, Berosus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the general Flood: and in that first part Berosus affirmeth, that those mighty men and Giants which inhabited Enoch, commanded over all Nations, and subjected the universal World: and though that phrase (Of all the World) be often used in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts, That there were dwelling at Hierusalem Jews, men that feared God of every Nation under Heaven: yet by the words which follow in Berosus, it is plain, that his words and sense were the same: for he addeth, from the Sun rising to the Sun setting, which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Again, we may safely conjecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his Sons at adventure, or left them as Discoverers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had been inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the Earth was more passable and easie to travel over before the Flood, than after it. For Pererius himself confesseth, that Attica (by reason of mud and slime which the water left upon the Earth) was uninhabited 200. years after Ogyges Flood; whereby we may gather, that there was no great pleasure in passing into farre Countreys, after the general Deluge, when the Earth lay (as it were) inclosed for 100. or 130. years together. And therefore was the face thereof in all conjecture more beautiful, and less cumbersome to walk over, in the first Age, than after the general overflowing.

Comment

§. VI.

Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. Verf. ult. whereupon Pererius grounded his Opinion.

Lastly, whereas Pererius draws this Argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis; And out of these were the Nations divided after the Flood: Quo significatur tantum divisiorem non fuisse ante diluvium; By which it appeareth (saith Pererius) that there was no such division before the Flood; which he also seeketh to confirm out of the eleventh of Genesis, because the division of Tongues was the cause of the dispersion of the people:

This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weak: The Text it self rather teacheth the contrary: For out of these (saith Moses) were the Nations divided in the Earth after the Flood; inferring, that before the Flood the Nations were divided out of others, though after the Flood out of these only. But whatsoever fence may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawn to the times before the Flood, or to any plantation or division in that Age: for if there were none else among whom the Earth could be divided after the Flood, but Noah's Sons, wherein doth that necessary division controul the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alledged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion; it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had never been built, nor any confusion of Languages at all, yet increase of people and time would have enforced a farther-off and general plantation: as Berosus says well, that when man-kind were exceedingly multiplied, Ad comparandas novitas sedes necessitas compellat, They were driven by necessity to seek new Habitations. For we find (as it is before said) that within 300. years after the Flood, there were gathered together into two Armies such multitudes, as the Valley about Babylon could not have sustained those numbers, with their increase, for any long time; all Asia, the Greater and the Lesser; all Scythia, Arabia, Palestina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the Islands thereof; Mauritania, and Lybia, being also at that time fully peopled. And if we believe Berosus, then not only those parts of the World, but (within 140. years after the Flood) Spain, Italy, and France were also planted: much more then may we think, that within 1656. years before the Flood, in the time of the chief strength of mankind, they were replenished with people. And certainly, seeing all the World was overflowed, there were people in all the World which offended.

§. VII.

A Conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phut (another Son of Ham) which peopled Lybia.

Therefore, for the Antiquity of the Egyptians, as I do not agree with Mercator, nor judge with the Vulgar, which give too much credit to the Egyptians Antiquities: so I do not think the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceive it. But I rather incline to this, that

Egypt

Egypt being peopled before the Flood, and 200. or 300. years more or less after Adam, there might remain unto the Sons of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillars or Altars (of Stone or Metal) of their former Kings or Governours: which the Egyptians having added to the List and Roll of their Kings after the Flood, in succeeding time (out of the vanity of glory, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memory of antiquity was in such sort preserved, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write, that the use of Letters, and the Art of Astronomy was known to the Babylonians 2634. years before Alexander's Conquest: and this report Annius findeth to agree, and reach to the time of Enoch, who was born 1034. years before the Flood, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christ's coming in judgment, as Saint Jude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquities to other mens judgments, and every man to his own reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it took the name of Egypt from Egyptus, the Son of Belus, as aforesaid. Being divided into two Regions, that part from Memphis, or Nicopolis, to the Mediterrane Sea, was called the Inferiour Egypt; furnished also Delta: because the several branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the River, gave it the form of the Greek Letter Delta which is the form of a Triangle. That branch, which ran toward the North-east, and embraced the Sea, next unto the Desarts of Syr and Pharan, had on it the City of Pelusium, where Senacherib was repelled: The other branch, which yielded it self to the Salt-water towards the North-east, is beautified by that famous City of Alexandria: The upper part of Egypt is bounded between Memphis and Syene near Ethiopia, and had the name of Thebaid of the ancient City of Thebes; which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates: and therefore called Civitas centum portarum; and by the Greeks, Dispolis; in the Scriptures No-hamon, which signifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding belief. Josephus calls Egypt, Mesfin of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirms that it had once the name of Thebais.

Phut, the third Son of Ham, took the next portion of Land to his Brother Mizraim, and inhabited Lybia: whose people were anciently called Phutai (saith Josephus) and Pliny mentioneth the River Phut in Mauritania: which River from the Mountain Atlas (known to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezekiel, that Phut, Chus, and Lud were contermini, and associates with the Egyptians.

§. XII.

Of the eleven Sons of Canaan, the fourth Son of Ham.

|| I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleven Sons.

Canaan (the fourth Son of Ham) possessed all that Region, called by the Romans Palestina; in the Scriptures Galilaea, Samaria, and Judea; in the latter times known by the name of the Holy Land and Jurie: the limits whereof are precisely set down by Moses, Genesis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar until Azzah, and as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrhah, and Adma, and Zeboim, even unto Latha. Now, howsoever these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be converted, Moses meaning was, that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan, and Zidon the North; Sodom and Gomorrhah the East, and the other Cities named, stood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right line from Gaza in the way of Egypt, the uttermost Territory of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now, the Sons of Canaan which possessed this Countrey, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleven.

1. Zidon.
2. Heth, or Ghetban.
3. Jebusi, or Jebusani.
4. Emori, or Emoreu, or Amoreu.
5. Girgisi, or Girgisani.
6. Hevi, or Chivenu.
7. Arki, or Harkenu.
8. Seni, or Sinenu.
9. Arvadi, or Arvadani.
10. Zemari, or Samarau, or Tzamarau.
11. Hamathi, or Hamathau, or Chamathu.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergesites, Amorites, Hevites, Jebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zemari, or Samarau, or from some of his.

|| II.

|| II.

Of the Portions of Zidon and Heth.

Zidon the first-born of Canaan, built the famous City of Zidon in Phenicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Asher: for Asher, Zabulon, and Nephthali had a great part of the ancient Phenicia distributed among them; but the Asherites could never obtain Zidon it self.

The second Son of Canaan was Heth, or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those seven principal Nations (Commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Hevites, and the Jebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron, near the Torrent Bejor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the uttermost limit of Canaan, having the Desart of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Piscus juramenti) four miles from Gaza, dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the North-east as Hebron, and Adma, and of Ephraim the Hittite, did Abraham buy the Field of Sarab burial. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her self to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her life for the Daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the seventh of the Kings; Israel hath hired against us the Kings of the Hittites.

Of the Jebusites and Amorites.

Jebusani, the third Son of Canaan, of whom came the Jebusites, and whose principal seat was Jebus (afterward Hiersusalem) were also a valliant and stubborn Nation, and held their City and the Countrey near it, till such time as David by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Jebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Solomon.

Amoreu was the fourth Son of Canaan, of whom the Amorites took name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, having Arnon and the Mountains of Galaad on the East, and Jordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basan) and Sihon (overthrown by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan: as behind Libanus, in the edge of Cæ- lojria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the Mountains of Juda, and in Idumaea, near the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometimes called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth: For the wickedness of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, we find in the Prophet Amos: Thou destroyed I the Amorite, before them, whose height was like the height of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oak.

|| IV.

Of the Gergesites, Hevites and Harkites.

The fifth Son of Canaan was Gergesius, or Gergefon (otherwise Girgisi) who inhabited on the East-side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolemy sets the City Gersa, which Josephus calls Gera, in the Territory of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ dispossessed the possessed with devils, and the Gergesites desired him to depart their Coasts, because their Swine, filled with the evil Spirits, drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee: Gergesius also built Beritis (sometime Geriz) afterward Felix Julia, three miles from the River Adonis in Phenicia: in which the Romans held a Garrison; and to which Augustus gave many large privileges.

Hevites the sixth Son, and Father of the Hevites, inhabited under Libanus near Emath. These Hevites, howsoever the Caphtorims expelled a good part of them (as in Dante's Divine Comedy the second is remembered) yet many of them remained all the Warr of Josua, and afterward to the time of Solomon. For God was not pleased utterly to root out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times served (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to assist them: for as it is written, Judges the third: They remained to prove Israel by them, whether they would obey the Commandments of God.

The seventh Son was Aracius, or Harki, who between the foot of Libanus and the Mediterrane Sea (over against Tripolis) built the City of Archas, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachis.

|| V.

Of Sini and Arvadi.

Sinens the eighth Son, Hierosolymitanus sets at Caparorja, which Ptolemy finds in Judea, not far from Jebus to the South thereof, saith Juvius. But it is more probable, bable, that sinews founded sin, which Saint Hierome calls Sim: Ptolemy, Smirra; Mela, and Pliny, Symirus: Brocard, Syon (called Synochis) near Arca. Perrinus thinks that sinews inhabited the Defarts of Sinai, or thereabout; but hereof there is no other certainty than the report of Brocard, who took view of all these places, affirming, that sinews built sinochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini, written with the letter C. (otherwise Kenei) who descended of Hobab the Son of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israhelites in their conduction through the wilderness of Pharan. But the Cinei were admitted among the Israhelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephthalims, beside their inhabitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinei, Balaam prophesied, that they should be destroyed by the Assyrians.

The ninth Son was Aradeus, or Arvadus, who in the Isle of Aradus, built the City Arados: opposite against which Island, on the Main of Phenicia, they founded another City of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this City came Saint Peter (saith Clement) and in this Isle preached the Gospel, and founded a Church in honour of our Lady: but we find no such work of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous, and places of skillfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembereth in his Prophecies against the Tyrians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad were thy Mariners.

v. 8.

¶ I. V. I. of Zemari.

OF Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth Son, there are divers Opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Celofyria at Edessa, and founded Samarain, which in Joshua is placed in the Tribe of Benjamin. There is also Samarain (of the same Orthography) upon the Mountain of Ephraim (saith Beroaldus) mentioned in the second of Chron. c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine converteth amiss (saith he) by Semerom. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast, makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the Parent of the Emissiani, which Pliny calls the Hemisseni, in Celofyria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembered. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthography, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omri) disproveth: And he bought the Mountain Samaria, of Shemerom, of one Shemar, for two Talents of Silver, and built in the Mountain; and called the name of the City which he built, after the name of Shemar, Lord of the Mountain, Samaria. But of all these places I shall speak more at large in the Conquest of the Holy Land, by the children of Israel. Of whomsoever the Samaritans were descended, sure I am, that they were ever a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the fate of the Jews stood up, they always called themselves Jews: when it suffered, or sank, they then utterly denied to be of that Nation or Family; for at such time as they were returned from their first captivity, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Assyrians, and partly of the Naturals.

THE last of Canaan's Sons was Hamathus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath (saith Beroaldus): of which (the aspiration taken away) the same is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamathus was present. Josephus, and Saint Hierome confound Emath with Antioch: not that Antioch which standeth on the River Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena, between the Mountain Cassius, and the Province of Pieria, and Seleucia, of which Saint Peter was Bishop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were born; but Antioch, surnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus supposeth, which standeth between Apamea and Emesa in Cassiotis. Yet indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch upon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emesa, are farther off seated from Canaan, than ever any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephthali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Province of Laodicea between it and any part of the Land divided. And if Libanon it self were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong unto them: for both the Provinces, Laodicea, and Libanica, are between Epiphania and any part of the Holy Land: and therefore Emath so taken, could not be a part of Nephthali, as in the thirteenth of Joshua is directly proved. For Joshua counting the Lands that remained unpossessed, reckoneth all Mount Libanon towards the Sun-rising, from Baalgad under Mount Hermom, until we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is used, that Emath was not in Nephthalim, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: because David accepted the presents of Tobu King of Emath, and (therewithal) conditions of peace: which he would not have done, if that Territory had ever belonged to the children of Israel, but would have recovered it without composition; and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight: For if the promise which God made, be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomy, then might Emath be comprehended, though seated altogether without the bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Moser and Joshua: for Emath is indeed situated on the other side of the Mountain of Hermom, which joyneth to Libanus; and is otherwise called Iurea. But whereas Hamath is named in Joshua 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine conversion Emath, therein (saith Beroaldus) was S. Hierome mistaken. Emath or Iurea is that over the Mountains, and the City in Nephthalim should be written Hamath: and so the Septuagint (understanding the difference) write it Amath and not Emath, the same which indeed belongeth to the Nephthalims, seated on the South side of Libanus, to the East of Affedim: which City S. Hierome writes Emath; Josephus, Hamath; others, Emathin, or Amatheos, and the people Amathein; of which (as I take it) Rabshakeb vaunteth in the second of Kings. Where is the God of Hamath?

Of the Sons of Chuth (excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter.)

The Sons of Chuth were,	{ Sheba , Havila , Saba , Raama , Sabteca , Nimrod . }	And the Sons of Raama were,	{ Sheba , Dedan , }
-------------------------	---	-----------------------------	--------------------------------------

That most of the Sons of Chuth were seated in Arabia the Happy: and of the Sabaeans that robbed Job: and of the Queen that came to Solomon.

Shea or Saba was the eldest son of Chuth, the eldest Son of Ham; to make a difference between Him and his Nephew Sheba, the Son of his Brother Raama or Regna (or Ragma after Montanus) his name is written with a single (S) Sanach, and Sheba the Son of Regna with an (S) asperat, which is the

Hebrew, Sabin. Seba the eldest Son of Chuth, Regna his brother, and Sheba the Son of Regna, posses'd both the shores of Arabia felix. Saba took that part towards the Red-Sea, as nearest his Father Chuth, and the Land of the Chushites: Regna and Sheba the East Coast of the same Arabia, which looketh into the Gulf of Perfus; of which Pliny: Sabat, Arabum populi, propter ibura clarissimi, ad utraque maria porcelli gentibus habitant; The Sabaeans, people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas (to wit) the Persian, and the Arabian or Red-Sea. This Country was afterwards called Arabia, a populi mixtionem, saith Posellus. To this agreeth Ptolemy, who setteth the City of Saba towards the Arabian or Red-Sea, and the City Rhagma towards the Persian; with whom also we may leave Saba: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolemy, because he remembereth a Nation (called Staber) near the Persian Sea, and Masjabatha which defended of them. But Montanus hath sent Regma, or (as he calls him) Rhama, into Carmania, for which I see no reason. Josephus, who only attended his own fancies, hath banished Saba or Seba to the border of Ethiopia. But Beroaldus thinks it strange, that the Sabei, which stole away Job's Cattel, should run through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petrea, and find out Job in Traconitis, between Palestina and Celofyria, 1200. miles off. Now, as this conjecture was more than ridiculous, so do I think, that neither the Sabei on the Red-Sea, nor those towards the Persian Sea, could by any means execute the stealth upon Job, which soever Beroaldus shall take for nearest. But these were the Sabei of Arabia the Desert, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth, out of his own experience, that the City Saba is seated: the same which Ptolemy calls Sava, now Semiscasac: and from this Saba in Arabia the Desert, came those Magi or Wise-men, which worshipped Christ, saith Melchior, whose words are these: The Magi came neither out of Mesopotamia (as Chrylston, Hierom, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Happy, as many wise-men do believe, but out of Saba in Arabia the Desert: which City, when my self was there, was (as I judged it) called Semiscasac. And to approve this Opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that these Sabei were neighbours to Job, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well those on the Persian Sea, as those on the Red Sea) are so disjoyned with large Deserts, as there is no possibility for strangers to pass them, especially with any numbers of Cattel, both in respect of the Mountains, of the sands, and of the extreme want of water in those parts: Ubi nec homines, nec bestia videntur, nec aues, imò nec arbores, nec gramen aliquod, sed non nisi montes, saxos, alijlimi, asper-rimi; Where there are found neither men, nor beasts, nor birds, no, nor so much as trees, or any pasture or grass, but only sharp, and high, stony, and craggy mountains. Beroaldus and Pervetus conceive, that the Queen of Saba, which came to visit Solomon, was of the Sabæi on the East side of Arabia Felix; but the contrary seems more probable, and that she was Queen of Saba towards the Red Sea; for Solomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petrea, betwixt Idumæa and the Red Sea, as far down as Midian, or Madian, and Ezion Gaber; and this Queen of Saba, which inhabited the West part of Arabia Felix, being his neighbour, might, without any far travel, enter his Territories; free from all danger of surprize by any other Prince or Nation.

Ezech. 17.
v. 22.

But, to avoid tediousness, it is manifest that Saba, or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Regma, with his Sons, Saba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the possessors of Arabia the Happy, and the Desert; onely Havilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the East side of Chubb, who held Arabia Petrea. Now, for Saba, there is found of his Name, the City of Sbbatha, or Sabota in the same Arabia: of which both Pliny and Ptolemy, who withall nameth Sabotela, within the walls whereof there was sometimes found sixty Temples. Ezechiel joineth the Father and the Son together, The Merchants of Soba and Raama were thy Merchants. And that they were the Eastern Arabians, their Merchandise witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradise. For Josephus his fancies, that Saba was the Parent of the Ethiopians about Meroe, and Sabta of the Ethiopians Asabari, they be not worthy any farther Answer then hath already been given: especially seeing these Cities, preserving the memory of the names of Saba, and of Sabta in Arabia, were yet remaining in Ptolemy's time, though in some letters changed. As also in the coasts adjoining the names of other of the brethren of the Family of Chubb, with little alterations, are preserved. In Arabia the Desert, is found the City of Sabæ, or Savae (now semisafac) with the City of Rhegana for Rhegma; and the Nation by Ptolemy himself called Raabeni of Raamah. In Arabia the Happy, is found the City of Rhegana, and Rabana; which also keepeth the found of Rhegma, the City of Sapha, or Saphat, not far from the East-coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and chief City in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha, and to the West of Sabatha towards the Red Sea, the great City of Saba; and the Nation adjoining, Sabai; and to the South thereof again toward the straight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Saba. To all these his brothers and nephews which were seated on the East side of Arabia, Havilah by the passage of Tygris was a neighbour, to whom he might pass by Boat, even unto Rhegma the City of Raama, or Rhegma, set near the River of Lar towards the mouth of the Persian Sea, which stood in Ptolemy's time.

II.

Josephus his Opinion of Dedan, one of the Line of Chubb, to have been seated in the West Ethiopia, disproved out of Ezechiel and Hieremy.

And whereas Josephus (whom in this Saint Hierom followeth, as not curious herein) sent Dedan the Son of Raamah into the West Ethiopia; it is strange that Ezechiel should couple Saba, and Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verse, and Saba and Raamah in 20. Verse, to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Ethiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Saba (the habitation of his father and brother) above four thousand miles. Besides which, the Merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Black-Moors. For they of Dedan (saith Ezechiel) were thy Merchants in precious cloaths for thy Chariots; and these Western Ethiopians never saw cloth, till the Portugals, seeking those Coasts, traded with them: the Merchandise of the Country being Hides, Elephants Teeth, some Gold and Amber, Civet-Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all these they exchanged for Linnen, or Iron chiefly.

But in those days, the West part of Africa, within the body of the Land, was known only by imagination: and, being under the burnt Zone, was held uninhabitable. And therefore, that the Negroes of the West Ethiopia, which inhabit about Serra Lions, or Niger, could either pass by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the bottom of the Mediterranean Sea, were a strange, or rather a foolish fancy. Now, to put it out of dispute, that Dedan also dwelt by the rest of the children of Chubb, which seats they held by that name in the time of Hieremy the Prophet; let us hear Hieremy his own words: Fly, ye inhabitants of Dedan, for I have brought the destruction of Esaus upon him. Hereby it appeareth, that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumeans: and Idumea is a Province of Arabia Petrea: and Dedan, which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Felix, joined in that part to Petrea, the seat of his Grand-father Chubb; which neighbourhood of Dedan and the Idumeans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel: I will stretch out my hand upon Edom, and destroy Ham and Beas out of it, and will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword.

v. 15.

§. XIII.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, Chap. 9. Verse 7.

After Chubb, it followeth to speak of Mizraim's Sons, whose names (saith Saint Augustine) were plural, to signifie the Nations which came of them. Ludim, the elder Son of Mizraim, was the Father of the Lybians in Africa: and the rest of his Brothers dispersed themselves into all the Regions adjoining. Among the Sons of Shem, there is also Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the Son of Mizraim by the singular number: the Son of Shem being written Lud; the Son of Mizraim, Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For, that Ludim the Son of Mizraim was the Parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was seated not far from Mizraim his Father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremie, who joined them in this sort together: Come up ye Horses, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-moors, and the Lybians which bear the shield: for those Nations assisted the Egyptians, being of one Parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phut and Lud are joined together. Ethiopia (or Chubb) saith Ezechiel, c. 30. v. 3. and Phut and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league, shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the Sons of Chubb (which were the Chubbites) the Sons of Mizraim (which were the Egyptians) and the Lybians (descended of his Son Lud) with other the Inhabitants of Egypt and Africa, shall fall together. Hierosolymitano finds also in Africa a Nation of the Lydians: And I believe it: because Hieremie joineth the Lybians and Lydians together in the place before remembered. But Libya in Africa is by the Hebrews called Ludim (saith Arim Montanus) though 2 Chron. 12. 3. they seem to be called Lubim, or Lubai, a name somewhat near the word Lybier, and by which it may seem that the truer writing is, not Lybier, but Lybier. Nei-

v. 9.

ther is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (upon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) understandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will have this threatening to be meant against the people of Lyda, a City (saith he) between Egypt and Palestina, which opinion I could not mislike, if the City of Lyda were so seated. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda, with a double d, and is the same City which was afterward Diospolis, in which S. Peter cured Aeneas of the Palsy) standeth near the Torrent Gann, not far from Joppa the Port of Hierusalem. Yet it is not impossible but that this City might have Lud for the Founder: For there are many Cities of one name, founded in all the Regions of the World, and farraunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Selencia and Antiochia: so of divers others. S. Hierome maketh Lehabim to be the Father of Libya, who was the third Son of Mizraim: and so doth Postellus; and either Opinion may be true.

The rest of Mizraim's Sons have no proper Countreys given them in the Scriptures, saving Casubim and Caphtorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Peleth.

These Casubim inhabited Cassotis, a Region lying in the entrance of Egypt from Palestina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountain Cassim are found, not far from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphtorim seated near Casubim in that Tract of Egypt called Sethrois, not far from Pelusium. Strabo calls it Sethrotis; Stephanus and Pliny, Sethrotis, of the City Sethron: which Ortelius takes to be the same which Ptolemy calls Heracles parva. Of the Casubim and Caphtorim came the Philistims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyls (which is) Alienigenæ, Strangers, or of a strange kindred. These Philistims inhabited the South part of the Holy Land towards Egypt, of whom Palestina took name. For the Hebrews (saith Isidore) do not use the letter (p) but instead of it (ph). Their principal Cities were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron; and the people of them called Gassai, Ascalonites, Azotites, Gethai, and Accaronites: Isidore affirms, that Ascalon was first called Philistim; and of that City the Countrey adjoining. But where Isidore had it, I know not.

The first known King of the Philistims, was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abraham's wife; with whom Abraham made a covenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written, that he was also King of the Philistims, these these words: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistines unto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some antienter Abimelech governed the Common-wealth greatly to his glory, the rest of his successors called themselves by the same name. The Philistines commanded that Tract of Land upon the Mediterraen Sea to the Northward, from the Castle of Pilgrinus (otherwise Cesarea Palestina, or Straton's Tower) which was the South border of Phoenicia, to Gaza, or to the River of Egypt. The Anakims or strong Gyants were of these Philistines: and Goliath was of Geth, one of the five Cities above named. They had sometimes five Kings, faith Lyrans. They mastered the Israelites at several times above 150. years, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by sampson and samuel; but in the end, this yoke was taken off by David, and laid on themselves.

It is Objected, that because these Cities and the Countries adjoining, were held by the Sons of Mixraim, therefore did the Israelites dispossest the Sons of Mixraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this faith Pererius, that although the Palestines or Philistines held it in the time of Joshua, yet at the time of the Promise it was possided by the Canaanites; as in the second of Deuteronomy. The Hevites dwelt in the Villages unto Gaza. And what marvel, if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were, from them? For that the Philistines were of Captior, and so of Mixraim, and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the Prophet Jeremy witnesseth: The Lord will destroy the Philistines: the remnant of the issue of Captior: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistines are said to be the reliques of Captiorum: Huc nos I brought up Israel out of the Land of Egypt, and the Philistines from Captior, and Aram from Kir so I read this place, with divers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, and Palestinos de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conversion Beroldus condemneth; where Captior is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a City directly West from Egypt, between Ptolomæ and Bazre and Apollonia; but Kir in Asia under the Assyrians: Junius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene; and so hath the Geneva. But Pererius calls Captiorum Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he mean Cappadocia in Palestina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the Left. For whether they inhabited Setbreiter, or Cappadocia, of Pale- stina, it is not certainly known. And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglatphalassar King of Assyria carried away the inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Josephus seems to understand this Kir of Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene, Media superior: for it was the manner and policy of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captived.

§. XV.

Of the issue of Sem.

§. I.

Of Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speak of the Sons of Sem, who are these:

1. Elam, or Elam,
2. Assur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

The posterity of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them he proceedeth in order with the Genealogie and Story of the Hebrews: (For of Sem was Abraham descended.)

Of these five Sons, the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the Children of him and Aram; the rest are barely spoken of by rehearsal of their names, saying that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Ninive) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the virtue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth us that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (saying India) which I believe Noah himself first inhabited: and to whom Opfir and Havilah the Sons of Jethan afterward repaired: Hi filii Sem ab Euphrate sunt partem Asia usque ad Oceanum Indicum tenuerunt. These Sons of Sem (faith

(St. Hierom) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembered, Ab. 2. v. 9. and the Princes of Persia; which name then began to be out of use and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchy being established in them. Some prophane Writers distinguishing Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susian) in Elam was the Kings seat of Persia (witness Daniel) And Isaw (faith he) in a Vifan, which is in the Province of Elam. This City is embraced by the River Euleus (according to Ptolemy) in Daniel, Ulai: and seated in the border of Susiana.

Assur (as most Historians believe) the second Son of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who did disdain the pride of Nimrod, parted from Zabel, and built Ninive, of equal beauty and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disprove that opinion. Every mans hand hath been in this Story, and therefore I shall not need herein to speak much: for the Assyrians so often invaded and spoiled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captives, as both in Divine and Humane letters therein large, and often mention of this Nation.

But howsoever Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honour this Nation with ample Dominion; yet was not the state of the Assyrians of any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus lost the Empire. For Senacherib, who was one of the powerfulest Princes among them, had yet the Mountain towards the utmost of his Dominion towards the North-east, and Syria bounded him towards the West, notwithstanding these vaunts of Senacherib in Ezay the 37. Have the Gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have destroyed: as Gozan, and Haran, and Refeph, and the children of Eden which were at Tellassar? Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the City Sepharuaim, Hena and Ivah? All these were indeed but petty Kings of Cities; and small Countries, as Haran in Mesopotamia: Refeph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Araria; under Libanus: the Isle of Eden: Sephar: and others of this sort. Yea, Nebuchadonazar, who was most powerful before the conquest of Egypt, had but Chaldeæ, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palestina, and Phenicia, parts thereof. But in this question of Assur, I will speak my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose Plantation I have omitted among the rest of the Chusites, because he established the first Empire: from whom the most memorable Story of the World taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldeans, faith Saint Hierom and Josephus; but it must be those Chaldeans about Ur: For the Sons of Cham possit the rest. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrews: For Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela; Heber, of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth Son of Shem, gave name to the Lydians in Asia the 16th, is the common opinion, taken from Josephus and Saint Hierom; but I see not by what reason he was moved to straggle thither from his friends.

§. II.

Of Aram, and his Sons.

Aram the first and last Son of Shem was the Parent of the Syrians: of which Damascus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrrus (faith Enchiridion out of Josephus) which Syrrus lived before Moses was born; the same which others call the Son of Apollo. Mesopotamia also, being but a Province of Syria, had the name of Aram Nabarajim, which is as much to say, as, Syria duorum fluviorum; Syria compassed with two Rivers, (to wit) Tygris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greeks Mesopotamia simply.

Arise and get thee to Padan Aram (faith Isaac to Jacob) to the house of Bethuel thy Mother's Father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo also remembereth it by the antient name of Aram, or Aramea, as these his own words converted witness: Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipsi Syri Aramensis & Arameis vocant. Josephus which we call Syrians (faith he) themselves call Arameians and Arameans.

Against this opinion, that Aram the Son of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in general; (and not only of those in Syria Inter-Amur, which is Mesopotamia) some read, Genes. 22. 21. Kemmel, the Father of the Syrians: where others out of the original read Kemmel, the Son of Aram. Neither is it any inconvenience for us to understand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of some one of note; the rather, because in the History of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before Kemmel Posterity could be famous) we find Mesopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition, sometimes with Nabarajim, and sometimes of Padan, to distinguish it from from another Aram, which (as it seems) then also was called Aram. For whereas Junius thinks, in his Notes upon Gen. 25. 20. that Padan-Aram ought to be restrained to some part of Mesopotamia (to wit) to that part which Ptolemy calls Ancobaria (so called from the River Chaboras, which, dividing it, runneth into Euphrates) the promiscuous use of Padan Aram, and Aram Naharajim (which latter appellation questionless comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seem to refute this Opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it signifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agreeth with this Region: because the two Rivers (as it were) yoked together go along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appear in the name of two Cities, in Ptolemy, called Aphadana (as Junius hath well noted) the one upon Chaboras, the other upon Euphrates.

Ux, or Hus, inhabited about Damascus, and built that City, saith Josephus and Saint Hierom. But Tostatus mistaking this Opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who also followeth Josephus, affirmeth, that Abraham's Steward, Eliczer, was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hus, the eldest Son of Aram, dwelt near unto his Father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same, adjoining to Arabia the Desert, and to Batanea, or Tracanis; whereof the Prophet Hierem: Rejoyce and be glad, O Land: thy daughter of Edom, that dwelleth in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the East Region of Tracanis, adjoining to Bajan, having Batanea Gansonitis, and the Mountain Seir to the East, Edrai to the South, Deffus North, and Jordan West: having in it many Cities and People, as may also be gathered out of Hierem: And all sorts of people, and all the Kings of the Land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Job, descended of Hus, the Son of Nabor, the Brother of Abraham (saith S. Hierom) and married Dina the Daughter of Jacob, saith Philo.

Hul, the second Son of Aram, S. Hierom makes the Father of the Armenians; and Gether, the third Son, Parent to the Acarnanians, or Carians: which Opinion (because I find not where to set him) I do not disprove, though I see no reason why Gether should leave the fellowship of his own Brethren, and dwell among strangers in Asia the less. Junius gives Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Desert of Palmyrena, as far as Euphrates, where Ptolemy setteth the City of Cholle.

Gether (saith Josephus) founded the Bactrians: but Josephus gave all Noah's children feathers, to carry them far away in all haste. For mine own Opinion, I always keep the rule of Neighbourhood, and think with Junius (to wit) That Gether seated himself near his Brothers in the Body of Syria, and in the Province of Cassotis, and Seleucia; where Ptolemy placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Pliny called Gindareni.

Junius also giveth to Mes, or Mesch the North part of Syria, between Cilicia and Mesopotamia, near the Mountain Mafus. The certainty of those Plantations can no otherwise be known than by this probability, that Aram the Father (of whom that great Region took name) planted his Sons in the same Land about him: for he wanted no scope of Territory for himself and them; neither then when the World was newly planted, nor in many hundred years after: and therefore there is no reason to cast them in the Desert parts of the World, so far asunder. And as necessity and policy held them together for a while; so ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, set them asunder. For although these Sons of Aram, and the Sons of the rest of Noah's children, kept themselves within the bounds of some one large Kingdom; yet therein every one also sought a Province apart, and to themselves; giving to the Cities therein built, their own names, thereby to leave their memory to their Posterity: the use of letters being then rare, and known to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Provinces: every one emulating and disdain the greatness of other, as they are thereby to this day subject to invasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as Novus Hispania and Pern excepted, because those Countreys are unaccessible to strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Mes, the fourth Son, is made the Parent of the Meovians: of whom something hath been spoken already. Arphaxad, the third Son of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two Sons, Phaleg and Jokan: and in Phaleg's time was the Earth divided.

¶ III. Of

¶ III.

Of the division of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the Sons of Heber, of the Issue of Sem.

The many People which at the division (at Phaleg's birth) were then living, and the thorough Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were divided at either. The Hebrews (saith Pererius out of Isidorus Hollam, one of their Chronicles) affirm that this partition hapned at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was born in the year after the Flood 101. and lived in all 239. years, which numbers added, make 340. And therefore was it so many years after the Flood, ere the children of Noah severed themselves. But to this Opinion of the Hebrews, and the doubt they make, how in so few years as 101. (the time of Phaleg's birth) so many people could be increased, Pererius gives this Answer. That if 70. persons of the Family of Jacob increased to 600000. fighting men in 215. years (besides women, children and impotent persons) how much more is it likely, that so soon after the Flood the children of Noah might, in a shorter time, bring forth many multitudes, having received the blessing of God, Increase and multiply, and fill the Earth? What strength this Answer hath, let others judge: for the children of Israhel were 70. and had 215. years time: and the Sons of Noah were but three, and had but 101. yeares of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceive that Phaleg took that name after the division, in memory thereof: as Josephus and S. Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the division were at Phaleg's death (which happened in the year, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was, by more likely computation 12. years before his birth) then was the division 38. years after Ninus, who governed 52. years: in the 43. year of whose Reign Abraham was born. But when Ninus began to rule the Assyrians, 80. years before this division (as this division is placed by the Hebrews, Hierom and Chrysostom) then was the Earth so peopled in all the East and Northern parts, as greater numbers have not been found at any time since. For Ninus, associating to himself Ariam King of Arabia, a People who at that time (saith Diadorus Siculus) plurimum opibus atque armis præstant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Cities in Armenia; received Barzanis into grace; then invaded Media, and crucified

Pharvus the King thereof, with his Wife and seven Children; vanquished all those Regions between Nilus and Tanais, the Egyptians, Phenicians, the Kingdoms of Syria, and all the Nations of Perfia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the number which followed Ninus (already remembered out of Ctesias) against Zoroaster and others: and Zoroaster on the other side who made resistance with 400000 prove it sufficiently, that if the division had not hapned before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no division at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their portions, as they sought to be masters of all, and greater Armies were there never gathered than by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this Opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

But for that conceit, that if the division had been made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers born to fill the Earth: It was never meant that the Earth could be filled every where at the very instant, but by times and degrees. And surely, whatsoever mens Opinions have been herein, yet it is certain, that the division of Tongues and of Men must go neer together with the ceasing of the work at Babel: and that the enterprise of Babel was left off instantly upon the confusion of Languages, where followed the execution of the division; and so neither at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was born in the year 101. after the Flood, which was the year that Nimrod came into Shinar, or ten years after he arrived, saith Berosus.

Now, if it be objected, That Phaleg (the Etymologie of whose name signifieth Division) must have lived without a name, except the name had been given him at the time of this confusion and partition: to this Objection, it may answered, That the change of names upon divers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures; for Jacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angel; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom, Esan; and that Phaleg being a principal man in this division, had his first name upon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, whereas the Hebrews, Saint Hierom, and Chrysostom, account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giving his Son the name Phaleg, he foretold the division which followed: to this I say, I do not find that Heber deserved any such honour, if he had thereupon so called his Son: for division and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessity; and this Prophecy (if any such had been) might also have reference to the division, which afterwards wards fell amongst the Hebrews themselves.

But if we give a reasonable time to the Building of the Tower and City of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstrative proof) might be increased: and that upon the fall thereof the confusion and division followed (whereupon Phaleg took name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

§. IV.

Of the sons of Jostan, the other son of Heber.

- The Sons of Jostan were,
1. Elmodad.
 2. Saleph, or Salep, or Sheleph.
 3. Asamath, or Chatzar.
 4. Jare, or Jaraab, or Jerath.
 5. Hadoram.
 6. Ozal, or Oxal.
 7. Dicklach, or Dicla.
 8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
 9. Abimeel.
 10. Sheba, or Seba.
 11. Ophir, or Ophir.
 12. Havilah, or Chavila, and
 13. Jobab.

Al those Sons of Jostan (according to Saint Hierom) dwelled in the East parts of the World, or India, even from the River Copbe or Chooz, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certain places of those thirteen Sons cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being general:

Gen. 10. 30. And their dwelling was from Mesha as thou goest unto Separ a Mount in the East. Of all these thirteen Sons, there were only three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Havilah. Concerning whose names, to avoid confusion, it is to be observed, that among the Sons of Chush, two of them had also the names of Sheba and Havilah. Abraham had also a third Saba, or Seba, his Grand-child by his wife Keturah. But Seba the Son of Chush, and Sheba the Son of Rhegma his Nephew we have left in Arabia Felix; and Havilah the Son of Chush upon Tygris. Saba the Grand-child of Abraham was (as some have thought) the Father of the Sabaens in Persia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis situ maketh mention; Primum Sabæi; post hos sunt Passi-garde; prope vero hos sunt Tifici. The first are Sabaens; after these be Passigarde; and near these the Tifici. And whereas it is written

Gen. 15. 6. ten: But unto the Sons of the Concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his Son (while he yet lived) Eastward to the East-Country:

Hereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the Son of Abraham wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthest in East-Country, in respect of Judea; which also David setteth under the Sun-setting. Yet seeing the rest of Abraham's Sons seated themselves on the borders of Judea: Rather choose to leave Saba the Son of Abraham in Arabia, the Desert, where Ptolemy setteth a City of that name.

But Saba, the Son of Jostan, the Son of Heber (as I conceive) inhabited India itself. For Dionysius Afer in his Periegesis (on description of the World) which he wrote in Greek Verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabæi. Taxilis has interpreted, habitaque Sabæus; In the middle of these dwell the Sabæi, and the Taxili, saith Dionysius.

§. V.

Of Ophir one of Jostan's Sons, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Solomon.

Ophir also was an inhabitant of the East India, and (as St. Hierom understands it) in one of the Islands plentiful with Gold, which are now known by the name of Moluccæ. Josephus understands Ophir to be one of those great head-lands in India, which by a general name are called Chersonese, or Peninsule: of which there are two very notorious; Calicut and Malacca. Pererius takes it rightly for an Island, as St. Hierom doth, but he sets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccæ farther East.

Arius Montanus, out of the second of Chronicles, the third Chapter and sixth Verse, gathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others, Mare pacificum. The words, in the second of the Chronicles, are these: And he over-laid the house with precious stones for beauty; and the gold was gold of Parvaim. Junius takes this gold to be the gold of Havilah, remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Town in Characene, a Province of Sassania, called Barbatia; so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Parvaim: from whence those Kings subjected by David, brought this gold, with which they presented him; and which David preserved for the enriching of the Temple.

But this fancy of Peru hath deceived many men, before Montanus, and Plessis, who also took Ophir for Peru. And that this Question may be a subject of no further dispute; it is very true that there is no Region in the World of that name: sure I am, that at least, America hath none, no not any City, Village or Mountain so called. But when Francis Pizarro first discovered those Lands to the South of Panama, arriving in that Region which Abalitia commanded (a Prince of magnificence, riches, and dominion inferior to none) some of the Spaniards, utterly ignorant of that language, demanding by signs (as they could) the name of the Country, and pointing with their hand athwart a River, or Torrent, or Brook that ran by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that Brook, or of Water in general. The Spaniards thereupon conceiving that the people had rightly understood them, set it down in the Diurnal of their enterprise; and so in the first description made, and sent over to Charles the Emperor, all that West part of America to the South of Panama, had the name of Peru, which hath continued ever since, as divers Spaniards in the Indies assured me; which also Abbas the Jesuite in his natural and moral History of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus also findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Jucatan) took that name of Jostan, who as he supposed navigated from the utmost East of India to America: it is most true; that Jucatan is nothing else in the language of that Country; but [What he thus?] or [What say you?] For when the Spaniards ask'd the name of that place (no man conceiving their meaning) one of the Salvages answered Jucatan (which is) What ask you, or What say you? The like happened touching Paria, a Mountainous Country on the South side of Trinidad, and Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men do) the names of those new Regions which they discovered, pointed to the Hills afar off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to say, as, high Hills or Mountains. For at Paria begins that marvellous ledg of Mountains, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan, from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South: and so hath that Country ever since retained the name of Paria.

The same happened among the Englishs, which I sent under Sir Richard Greenville to inhabit Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of that Country, one of the Salvages answered, Wingandacan; which is as much to say, as, You wear good cloaths, or gay cloaths. The same happened to the Spaniard in asking the name of the Island Trinidad: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that self place which the Sea encompassed, they answered, Caeri, which signifieth an Island. And in this manner have many places, newly discovered, been entituled, of which Peru is one. And therefore we must leave Ophir among the Moluccæ, whereabout such an Island is credibly affirmed to be.

Now, although there may be found Gold in Arabia itself (towards Persia) in Havilah, now Susana; and all alongst that East Indian shore; yet the greatest plenty is taken up at the Philippines, certain Islands planted by the Spaniards, from the East India. And by the length of the passage which Solomon's Ships made from the Red-Sea (which was three years in going and coming) it seemeth they went to the uttermost East, as the Moluccæ or Philippines. Indeed these that now go from Portugal, or from hence, finish that navigation in two years, and sometimes less: and Solomon's Ships went not above a tenth part of this our course from hence. But we must consider, that they evermore kept the coast, and crept by the shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the use of the compass was known, it was impossible to navigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Solomon's Ships could not find Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselves (had it not been for the plenty of Gold in the East India Islands, far above the Mines of any one place of America) to sail every year to the West part of America thither, and there to have strongly planted; and inhabited the richest of those Islands: wherein they built a City called Manila. Solomon therefore needed not to have gone farther off than Ophir in the East, to have sped work: neither could he navigate from the East to the West in those days, whereas he had no coast to have guided him.

Jostan also gathereth a fantastical Opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Country, whose mountains of Gold are kept by Griffins: which mountains Solinus affirmed to be in Scythia Asiatica, in these words: Nam cum Anro & Gennatis affiant, Griffes tenent universa, alites ferocissime, Arimaspi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these Countries abound in Gold and rich stones, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kind of Fowl, the fiercest of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people, called Arimaspi, make war. These Arimaspi are said to have been men with one eye only, like unto the Cyclops of Sicilia: of which Cyclops, Herodotus, and Aristotle make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third Book: and Valerius

lib. 6.
Dionorus Siculus
lib. 16.

Flaccus: and D. Siculus, in the Story of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine own Opinion) I believe none of them. And for these Arimaspi, I take it that this name signifying one-eyed, was first given them, by reason that they used to wear a vizzard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serve both eyes; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Solinus borroweth these things out of Pliny, who speaks of such a Nation in the extreme North, at a place called Gislahitron, or the Cave of the North-east wind. For the rest, as all Fables were commonly grounded upon some true Stories, or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receive this moral: That if those men, which fight against so many dangerous passages for Gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect senses, and were not deprived of half their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and understanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subject themselves to famine, corrupt air, violent heat and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this Fable be feigned in this place, yet, if such a tale were told of some other places of the World, where wilde Beasts or Serpents defend mountains of Gold, it might be avowed. For there are in many places of the World, especially in America, many high and impassable mountains, which are very rich, and full of Gold, inhabited onely with Tigers, Lions, and other ravenous and cruel Beasts: unto which, if any man ascend (except his strength be very great) he shall be sure to find the same war which the Arimaspi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of the Gold, or seek to defend that metal, but being disquieted, or made afraid of themselves or their young ones, they grow enraged and adventurous. In like sort it may be said, that the Alegartos (which the Egyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those Pearls which lie in the Lakes of the In-land: for many times the poor Indians are eaten up by them, when they dive for the Pearl. And though the Alegartos know not the Pearl, yet they find favour in the flesh and bloud of the Indians, whom they devour.

¶ VI.

Of Havilah the Son of Joſtan, who also passed into the East-Indies: and of Melha and Sepher named in the bordering of the families of Joſtan: with a Conclusion of this Discourse touching the plantation of the World.

OF Havilah the Son of Joſtan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the general Opinion is, that he, also inhabited in the East-India, in the Continent, from which Opbir pass into the Islands adjoining. And whereas Ganges is said to water Havilah, it is meant by Havilah in the East-India, which took name of Havilah the Son of Joſtan: but Havilah which Pison compasseth, was so called of Havilah the Son of Chus, as is formerly proved by this place of Scripture: Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah, as thou comest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But, that Saul ever made war in the East-India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteen Sons of Joſtan, these three, Saba, Havilah, and Opbir, though at the first seated by their Brethren about the Hill Mafus, or Mesb, Gen. 10. 26. (to wit) between Cilicia and Mesopotamia; yet, at length, either themselves, or their issues removed into the East-India, leaving the other Families of Joſtan, to fill the Countreys of their first plantations, which the Scripture defines to have been from Mesb unto Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Mesb to be a Region of the East-India, and Sephar a Mountain of the same (which Mountain, Montanus would have to be the Andes in America) those fancies are far beyond my understanding. For, the word (East) in the Scriptures, where hath reference to Judah, is never farther extended than into Persia. But Mesb is that part of the Mountain of Mafus in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the River Chaboras springeth, which runneth by Charran: and in the same Region we also find for Sephar (remembered by Moses) Sippbara by Ptolemy, standing to the East of the Mountain Mafus; from whence, Joſtan having many Sons, some of them might pass into India, hearing of the beauty and riches thereof. But this was in process of time.

The other fashion of Planting I understand not, being grounded but upon mens imaginations, contrary to reason and possibility. And that this Mountain in the East was no farther off than in those Regions before remembered, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is used: as in Numbers 23. Balac the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountain of the East; which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balac brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia (witness this place of Deuteronomy;) Because they hired Balaam the Son of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Naharajim, to curse thee: for Aram Naharajim was Syria fluviorum, which is Mesopotamia, as afore said.

This plantation of the World after the Flood

Floud doth best agree (as to me it seems) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of reason and probable conjecture; the guides which I have followed herein, and which I have chosen to go after; making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their own fancies, be they ancient or modern. Neither have I any end herein, private or publick, other than the discovery of truth. For as the partiality of man to himself hath disguised all things: so the factious and hireling Historians of all Ages (especially of these later Times) have, by their many Volumes of untrue reports, left Honour without a Monument, and Virtue without Memory: and (in stead thereof) have erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darkest forgetfulness ought to have buried, and covered over for evermore. And although the length and dissolving nature of time hath worn out or changed the names and memory of the Worlds first Planters after the Floud (I mean the greatest number, and most part of them) yet all the footsteps of Antiquity (as appears by that which hath been spoken) are not quite worn out, nor over-grown: for Babylon hath to this day the sound of Babel; Phenicia hath Zidon, to which City the eldest Son of Canaan gave name; so hath Cilicia, Tharsis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hibernian, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumeans, Libyans, Moors, and other Nations, have preserved from the death of forgetfulness some signs of their first Founders and true Parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Beginning and Establishment of Government.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the first Government under the eldest of the Families to be Regal, and from Regal absolute, to Regal tempered with Laws.

I followeth now, to intreat how the World began to receive Rule and Government, which (while it had scarcity of people) underwent no other Dominion than Paternity and Elderhip. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was always used, both for the Magistrate, and for those of Age and Gravity: the same bearing one signification almost in all Languages. For, in the Eleventh of Numbers, God commanded Moses to gather together 70 of the Elders of the people, and Governours over them: the Hebrew bearing the same sense which the Latine word senes, or Seniores doth. So it is written in Sylphana, Then the Assembly believed them as those that were the Elders and Judges of the people. And so in the words of those false Judges and Witnesses to Daniel, Shew it unto us, seeing God hath given thee the Office of an Elder. Demosthenes useth the same word for the Magistrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato giveth two other reasons for this appellation: Apud Lacedæmonios qui amplissimum Magistratum gerunt, ut sunt, sic etiam appellantur, Senes; Among the Lacedæmonians, the chief Magistrates, as they were, so they are called, Eldermen: And again, Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Majores nostri appellassent Senatum; If reason and advisement were not in old men, our Ancestours had never called the highest Council by the name of Senate.

But, though these reasons may well be given, yet we doubt not, but in this name of (Elders) for Governours, or Counsellours of State, there is a sign that the first Governours were the Fathers of Families; and under them the eldest Sons. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard, take the word (signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loysseau) puissance in propriety, or proper power. The kinds of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: The one, Potestas aut imperium, Power or command: the other, Proprietas aut dominium; Propriety or master-ship: The correlative of the one is the Subject; of the other, the Slave. Ad Cæsarem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet; ad singulos proprietas; Cæsar hath power over all, and every man propriety in his own: And again, Cæsar omnia imperio possidet, singuli domino; Cæsar holdeth all in his power, and every every man possesseth his own. But as men and vice began abundantly to increase: so obedience (the fruit of natural reverence, which but from excellent seed seldom ripeneth) being exceedingly over-shadowed with pride, and ill examples, utterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of Paternal persuasions (after man-kind began to neglect and forget the Original and first giver of life) became in all over-weak, either to resist the first inclination of evil, or after (when it became habitual) to constrain it. So that now, when the hearts of men were only guided and steered by their own fancies, and toft to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the World, while Wildom was severed from power, and strength from charity: Necessity (which bindeth every nature but the immortal) made both the wise and foolish understand at once; that the estate of reasonable men would become far more miserable than that of beasts, and that a general flood of confusion would a second time over-flow them, did they not, by a general obedience to Order and Dominion, prevent it. For the mighty, who trusted in their own strengths, found others again (by interchange of times) more mighty than themselves: the feeble fell under the forcible; and the equal from equal received equal harms. Inasmuch, that the licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a liberty upon the first acquaintance) proved, upon a better trial, no less perillous than undurable bondage.

These Arguments, by Necessity propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, persuaded all Nations which the Heavens cover, to subject themselves to a Master, and to Magistracy in some degree. Under which Government, as the change (which brought with it less evil, than the former mischiefs) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wise that observe it) found some imperfection and corrosive in this cure. And therefore the same Necessity which invented, and the same Reason which approved, Sovereign power, brought it self of certain equal rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundless) might also discern her own limits. For before the invention of Laws, private affections in suprem Rulers made their own fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen; measuring by this Yard, and weighing in this Balance, both good and evil.

For as wisdom in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings; so the will of Kings forewent the inventions of Laws. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum prole-

gibus erant; The people were not governed by any other laws than the wills of Princes. Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those men's Virtues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those men's Vices deform them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt: Love sees one while too much, another while shew nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few years (for discretion and restraint of Royal power) Laws were established: and that Government which had this mixture of equality (holding in an even Balance supreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regal: the other (which had it not) was known for Tyrannical: the one, God established in favour of his people; the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancy of this Regal authority, Princes as they were chosen for their virtues only, so did they measure their powers by a great deal of moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia iusti erant, & religiosius dedisti, iustitiam Dii & diis; Princes because they were just and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods.

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to Reason and Necessity; yet it was God himself that first kindled this light in the minds of men, whereby they saw that they could not live and be preserved without a Ruler and Conductor: God himself by his eternal providence having ordained Kings; and the Law of Nature, Leaders, and Rulers over others. For the very Bees have their Prince; the Deer their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their own safety. The most High beareth rule over the Kingdoms, Dom. 10. of Men; and appointeth over it whomsoever he pleareth. By me (saith Wisdom, spoken by the Son of God) Kings reign; by me 11. Princes rule. And it is God (saith Daniel) Dom. 11. that setteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings. And that this power is given from God, Christ himself witnesseth, speaking to Pilate; Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above.

It was therefore by a threefold Justice that the World hath been governed from the beginning (to wit) by a Justice natural; by which the Parents and Elders of Families governed their Children, and Nephews, and Families; in which government the Obedience was called natural Piety: A-gaine, by a Justice divine, drawn from the Laws and Ordinances of God; and the Obedience hereunto was called Conscience: And lastly, by a Justice civil, begotten by both the former; and the Obedience to this we call Duty. That by these three, those of the eldest times were commanded, and that the rule in general was Paternal, it is most evident: for Adam, being Lord over his own Children, instructed them in the service of God his Creator; as we read, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had been taught by their Parent, the Father of Mankind.

§. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government, with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane Society.

What other Policy was exercised, or State founded, after such time as mankind was greatly multiplied before the Flood, it cannot be certainly known, though it seem by probable conjecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first Age: it being possible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembered among their antiquities) were before the general Flood; and very likely, that the cruel Oppressions in that Age proceeded from some Tyranny in Government, or from some rougher form of Rule, than the Paternal.

Benafai ascribeth the rule of the World in those days to the Giants of Libanus, who mastered (saith he) all Nations from the Sun rising to the Sun set. But in the second Age of the World, and after such times as the rule of Eldership failed, three several sorts of Government were in several times established among men, according to the divers natures of Places and People.

The first, the most ancient, most general, and most approved, was the Government of one, ruling by just Laws, called Monarchy: to which Tyranny is opposed, being also a sole and absolute Rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or observation of the Laws of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magistratè (saith Aristotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equity: and of this condition ought every Magistratè to be; according to the rule of Gods word: Judges and Officers: shall thou make thee in thy Cities: And these shall judge the people with righteous judgment.

The second Government, is of divers principal Persons established by Order, and ruling by Laws, called Aristocracy, or Oligarchy; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and usurpation of a few great-ones) is opposed: as the Decem viri, or Trium viri, and the like.

The third is a State popular, (or Government of the people) called Democracy, to which is opposed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent unjust ruling of the confused multitude, sedulously swaying the State, contrary to their own Laws and Ordinances. These three kinds of Government are briefly expressed by Tholofanus; unius, paucorum, & multorum; of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of Policy since the second increase of mankind, the same grew in this sort: First of all, every Father, or eldest of the Family, gave Laws to his own issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These, as they were multiplied into many households (man by nature loving society) joynted their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vici; of the Greek κωμ, which signifies a Holse; or of the word (Ψα) because it hath divers waies and paths leading to it. And as the first House grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus (being a society of divers Villages) so called of the Greeks μυνη which signifieth a Fountain: because many people (having their habitations not far asunder) drank of one Spring or Stream of Water. To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some think) Shires, answereth not unfailly.

But as men and impley began to gather strength, and as emulation and pride, between the Race of the one and the other, daily increased: so both to defend themselves from our rage, and to preserve such goods as they had gathered, they began to joyn and set together divers of their Villages, invironing them first with Banks and Ditches, and afterwards with Walls: which, being so compacted, were then called Oppida; either ab opponendo scilicet hostibus, because walls were opposed against Enemies; or ab opibus, because thither they gathered their riches for safety and defence: as also they were called Urbes, ab orbe, because when they were to build a City, they made a Circle with a Plough (saith Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortifie. And although Urbs and Civitas be often confounded, yet the difference was antiently in this, that Urbs signified no other than the very walls and buildings, and Civitas was taken for the Citizens, inhabiting therein: so called of Civis, and that, ab eo quod multitudine coivit, of coming together. But all inhabitants within these walls are not properly Citizens, but only such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the City,

City, may by turns become Officers and Magistrates thereof: the rest go under the name of Subjects, though Citizens by the same general name of Subjects are also known. For every Citizen is a Subject, but not every Subject a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chief Magistrate, if he be to be teamed one of the Citizens) is no Subject; but of this we need not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken à Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Adverb Magis (as also Magisteria, Precepts of Art) or else from the Greek word (Magistros) and so the Greeks call them Magistrates, whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magistratus.

The Office and Duty of every Magistrate, Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith he) is the keeper of right and equity; but the same is best taught by Saint Paul, who expresseth both the cause efficient, and final, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together with their Duties and Office. A Magistrate is the Minister of God for thy wealth; but if thou do evil, fear: for he beareth not the sword for naught. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth evil. He also teacheth in the same place; That every soul ought to be subject to the higher powers, because they are by God ordained, and that whosoever resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giver and fountain thereof: and shall not only be therefore subject to the judgment and condemnation of Man, but of God: For ye must be subject (saith he) not because of wrath only, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbed of Gods punishments, upon those that have resisted Authority, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any Subject therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with injustice or cruelty: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the Commandment of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himself subjected themselves to the power of Magistracy. Christ commanded that all due to Cæsar should be given unto him: and he payed Tribute for himself and Peter. Hieremy commanded the Israelites (even those that were, Captives under Heathen Kings) to pray for them and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech; and Jacob blessed the King of Egypt: And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saviour (saith Paul) that ye make supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in authority: as if for such Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much said Saint Chrysostom, in his Homily to the people, prefer Monarchical Government, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) than that they should be wanting: Præstat Regem tyrannum habere, quam nullum; Better a tyrannous King, than no King: to which also Tacitus subscribeth: Præstat (saith Tacitus in the first of his History) sub malo principe esse, quam nullo; It is better to have a bad Prince than none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no liberty more safe, than to serve them: Neque enim libertas tutior ulla est (saith Claudian) quam Domino servire bono; No liberty (saith he) more safe for us than to be servants to the virtuous. And certainly, howsoever it may be disputed, yet it is safer to live under one Tyrant, than under 100000 Tyrants: under a wise man that is cruel, than under the foolish and barbarous cruelty of the multitude. For as Agellam answered a Citizen of Sparta, that desired an alteration of Government, That kind of rule which a man would disdain in his own house, were very unfit to govern great Regions by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erect many Cottages for their many Children: and as (for the reason before remembred) many Households joynted themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens joynted together, and established Laws by consent, associating themselves under one Governour, and Government; they, so joynted, were called a Common-Wealth: the same being sometimes governed by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the People themselves.

§. III.

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

Now this first Age after the Flood, and after such time as the people were increased, and Families became strong, and they dispersed into several parts of the world, was by ancient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Covetousness being as then but green, and newly grown up, the seeds and effects whereof were as yet but potential, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then sought for no larger Territory than themselves could compas and manure: they erected no other magnificent Buildings, than sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest:

tempest: they cared for no other delicacy of fare, or curiosity of dyer, than to maintain life: nor for any other apparel, than to cover them from the Cold, the Rain and the Sun.

And sure if we understand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicity of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truly be cast upon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time than to another (I mean to one limited time and none else) it may be doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times have brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancy of Empiry (when Princes played their Prizes, and did then only woo men to obedience) might be called the Golden Ages, so may the beginning of all Princes times be truly called Golden. For be it that men affect honour, it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deceptions have commonly the least impediments: and if ever Liberty overflow her banks and bounds, the same is then best warranted both by policy and example. But Age and Time, do not only harden and shrink the openness and most jealous hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes torn estates before their eyes, and (withal) persuadeth them to compassionate themselves. And although there be no Kings under the Sun whose means are answerable unto other mens desires: yet such as value all things by their own respects, do no sooner find their appetites unanswered, but they complain of alteration, and account the times injurious and Iron. And as this falleth out in the Reign of every King, so doth it in the life of every man, if his daies be many: for our younger years are our Golden Ages which being eaten up by time, we praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeed) the grievous alterations in our selves, and the pains and diseases which never part from us but at the grave, make the times seem so differing and displeasing: especially the quality of man's nature being also such, as it adoreth and extollet the passages of the former, and condemneth the present state how just soever: Fit humane malignitatis vitio, ut semper vetera in laude, presentia in fastidio sint; It comes to pass (saith Tacitus) by the vice of our malignity, that we alwayes extol the time past, and hold the present fastidious: For it is one of the errors of wayward Age: Quod sint laudatores temporis acti; That they are praisers of fore-past times, forgetting this advice of

Solomon: Say not then, Why is it that the former daies were better then these? For thou dost not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose Seneca, *Maiores nostri quæsti sunt, & nos querimus; posterius queruntur, quæ prius esse mores, regnare, nequitiam, in deterius res hominum & in omne nefasabile. Our ancestors have complained, we do complain, our Children will complain, that good manners are gone, that wickedness doth reign, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all evil. These are usually the Discourses of Age and Misfortune. But hereof what can we add: to this of Arnobius? Nova res quædamque vetus fiet, & vatus temporibus quibus cepit nova fuit & regentina. Whatsoever is new, in time shall be made old: and the ancientest things when they look beginning were also new and seldom. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentment of present times have made Golden, this we may set down for certain. That as it was the virtue of the first Kings, which (after God) gave them Crowns: so the love of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crowns on their heads: And as God gave the obedience of Subjects to Princes: so (relatively) he gave the care and justice of Kings to the Subjects; having respect, not only to the Kings themselves, but even to the meanness of his Creatures: *Nunquam particulari bona servit omnis iustitia; bonum; The infinite goodness of God doth not attend any one only: for he that made the small and great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which Kings have of all theirs, which makes them beloved of all theirs; and by a general love it is, that Princes hold a general obedience: For, Potestas humana radicatur in voluntatibus hominum: All humane power is rooted in the will or dispositions of men.

§. IV.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the want thereof without virtue.

And with this Supreme Rule and Kingly authority, began also other degrees and differences among Subjects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen; unto whom they gave place, trust, and power. From which employments and Offices sprung those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which have continued from Age to Age, to these daies. But this Nobility, or difference from the vulgar, was not in the beginning given to the Succession of Blood, but to Succession of Virtue, as hereafter may be proved. Though at length it was sufficient for

for those whose Parents were advanced, to be known for the Sons of such Fathers; and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all; or any contention for them to excell, upon whom glory or worldly Nobility necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobility denomination in the beginning. That such as excelled others in Virtue, were so called: Hinc dictus Nobilitas, quasi virtute preclatis nobilitas. But after such time as the deserved Honour of the Father was given in reward to his Posterity, Sainte Jerom judged of the Succession in this manner: *Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quidam necessitate confringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent; I see no other thing to be desired in Nobility, than that Nobles even are by a kind of necessity bound, not to degenerate from the virtue of their Ancestors. For if Nobility be Virtute antiqua dicitur Virtute, and ancient riches, then to exceed in all those things which are extra hominum, as riches, power, glory, and the like, do no otherwise define Nobility, than the word (Animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if Honour (according to L. Vives) be a witness of virtue and well-doing; and Nobility (after Plutarch) the continuance of Virtue in a Race or Lineage: then are those in whom Virtue is extinguished, but like unto Painted and Printed Papers, which ignorant men worship in stead of Christ, our Lady, and other Saints: men in whom there remain but the dregs and Vices of ancient Virtue: Flowers, and Herbs, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to Weeds. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountains, if in all the rest of their course they run foule, filthy, and defiled? Ex terra fertili produciuntur aliquando Cicuta venenosa, ex terra ferili pretiosum Aurum; Out of fruitful ground ariseth sometimes poisoning Herbance, and out of barren soyle precious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and form, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobility) call the Race and Lineage but the matter of Nobility: the form (which gives life and perfect being) he maketh to be Virtue, and Quality, profitable to the Common-weal. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publick Virtue, serving his Prince and Country, and being defended of Parents and Ancestors that have done the like. And although that Nobility, which the same Author calleth personal (the same which our selves acquire by our Virtue and well-doings) cannot be ballaced with that which is both natural by Descent, and also*

Personal; yet if Virtue be wanting to the natural, then is the personal and acquired Nobility, by many degrees, to be preferred: For (saith Charron) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light upon such a one, as in his own nature is a true Villain. There is also a third Nobility, which he calleth Nobility in Parchment, bought with Silver or Favour, and these be indeed but Honours of affection, which Kings, with the change of their Fancies, with they knew well how to wipe off again. But surely, if we had as much sense of our degenerating in worthiness, as we have of vanity in deriving our selves of such and such Parents, we should rather know such Nobility (without Virtue) to be shame and dishonour, than Nobleness and glory to vaunt thereof. What calamity is wanting (saith Bernard) to him, that is born in sin, of a Poshare body and barren mind? For (according to the same Father) Dele fucum fugacis honoris huius, & male coronate nitore gloria, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill-crowned glory, that then thou mayest consider thy self nakedly: for thou camest naked out of thy Mothers wombe. Camest thou thence with thy Myre, or glistering with Jewels, or garnished with Silks, or adorned with Feathers, or suffred with Gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration, as certain morning clouds, which do but mill soon pass over, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poor, and wretched, and miserable man, and blushing, because he is naked, and weeping, because he is born, and repining, because he is born to labour, and not to honour.

For, as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference between it and dust: which if thou dost not believe (saith St. Chrysostom) look into the Sepulchres and Monuments of thy Ancestors, and they shall easily persuade thee by their own example, that thou art dust and dirt: so that if man seem more noble, and beautiful than dust, this proceedeth not from the diversity of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creatour.

For true Nobility standeth in the Trade Of virtuous life; not in the fleshy Line: For blood is brute, but Gentry is Divine.

And howsoever the custom of the World have made it good, that Honours be call by birth upon unworthy Issues: yet Solomon (as wise as any King) reprehendeth the same in his fellow-Princes: There is an evil (saith he) that I have seen under the Sun, as an error that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth: Folly is set in great excellency.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.

That Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like a Sovereign Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to have been of just authority.

THE first of all that reigned as Babylon: no mention at all being made of Sovereign Lord, after the Noah (the years of his life excepted) in the Flood, was Nimrod, the Son succeeding Story of the Hebrews; nor that Sem was in this disobedient troop, or among the builders of Babel.

S. Augustine in one of these two respects: either for his eminency, and because he was the first of fame, and took on him to command others: or else, in that he was begotten by Chush, after is other children were also become Fathers; and of a later time than some of his Grand-children and Nephews. Howsoever, seeing Moses in expres words, calleth Nimrod the Son of Chush, other mens conjectures to the contrary, ought to have no respect.

This Empire of Nimrod, both the Fathers, and many later Writers call tyrannical: the same beginning in Babel (which is) confusion. But it seemeth to me, that Melancthon conceived not amiss hereof: the same exposition being also made by the Author of that Work, called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirms that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, A bitter, or severe Governour, because his form of Rule seemed, at first, far more terrible than Paternal authority. And therefore is he in this respect also called A mighty Hunter: because he took and destroyed both beasts and thieves. But S. Augustine understands it otherwise, and converts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mighty Hunter against God: Sic ergo intelligendus est Gigas ille, Venator contra Dominum; So is that Giant to be understood, a Hunter against the Lord.

But howsoever this word (A mighty Hunter) be understood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those which went with him from the East into Shinar: so, this charge was rather given him, than by him usurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himself, or any of the Sons of his own body, came with this troop into

The same is also confirmed by divers Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Joltan, were the Captains and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himself so far as Shinar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his Son's Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrews (according to the generall opinion) took beginning, who inhabited the Southermost parts of Chaldea, about the City of Ur, from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldea, were no partners in the unbelieving work of the Tower: therefore (as many of the Fathers conjecture) did they retain the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his Issues: In familia Heber remansit hæc lingua; In the family of Heber this language remained (saith Saint Augustine out of Epiphanius) and this Language Abraham used; yea, it was anciently, and before the Flood, the general speech; and therefore first called (saith Cælestinus) lingua humana: the humane tongue.

We know that Coropim Becanis following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Egyptians, Vergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoever we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolve, that none of the godly seed of Sem were the chief Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely, but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by just authority, than violence of usurpation.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus were three distinct Persons.

BEnzo, and out of him Naclerus, with others, make many Nimrods; Eusebius confounds him with Belus, and so doth Saint Hieron upon Ose; and these words of Saint Augustine seem to make him of the same Opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Beli, qui primus illic regnaverat 65. annos. There did Ninus reign after the death of his father Belus, who governed in Babylon sixty five years. But it could not be unknown to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the Establisher of that Empire: Moses being plain and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom (saith he) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar; wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly, it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement.) supposed; for in Ninus his time, the World was marvellously replenished. And if S. Augustine had undoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would have given him the name, which the Scriptures give him, rather than have borrowed any thing out of prophane Authours. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnaverat; Who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words do not disprove that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Julius Cesar overthrowed the liberty of the Romans Common-wealth, making himself perpetual Dictator; yet Augustus was the first established Emperour, and the first that reigned absolutely by sovereign Authority over the Romans, as an Emperour.

The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternity, laying the foundation of sovereign rule, as Cesar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with general allowance, exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them, both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. years after the Flood (as they account) that Belus reigned; but such agreement of times proves it not. For, so Edward the third, and his Grand-child, Richard the second, were Kings both in one year: the one died; the other in the same year was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable than that of Mercator; who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For, it is plain, that the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom was Babel, and the Towns adjoining; but the first, and most famous work of Ninus, was the City of Ninive.

Now, whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus overcame and suppressed the Babylonians, the same rather proveth the contrary, than that Ninus and Nimrod were one Person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Ninive in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recovered again by strong hand; which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time.

—Dicitur akam

Codolibus muris circumfisse Semiramis Urbem.

Semiramis with walls of Brick, the City did inclose.

Further, where it is alleged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mighty; so Justine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercator's Arguments; it may be answered, that such an addition might have been given to many other Kings as well. For, if we may believe Justine's, then were Rexosus King of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia, mighty Kings before Ninus was born. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the undertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference between them.

For, whereas Mercator conceiveth, that he was too early, for any that lived about the time of the confusion of Languages, to have invaded and mastered those Cities so far removed from Babel, namely, Erech, Accad, and Chalne: which work he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest undertaking; and consequently would have Nimrod to have been long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one Person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I do not find that supposition true. That ever Nimrod invaded any of these Cities; but that he founded them, and built them from the ground, being the first after the Flood; that conducted the children of Noah into those parts; and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hand.

Besides, whereas these Cities, in many mens opinions, are found to stand far away from Babylon, I find no reason to bring me to that belief. The City of Accad, which the Septuagint calls Archad; and Epiphanius, Arphal; Junius takes it to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for for the Region thereabout, the Cosmographers (saith he) call Accadene for Accadene. Others understand Nisibis and Ninive, to be one City: so do Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Arad, and Charran, are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accadene to be a Region of Mesopotamia; the same which Arias Montanus, out of S. Hieron, calls Achad; and so do the Hebrews also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the City of Erech, which the Septuagint call Oreb; S. Augustine, Oreg; and Pagninus, Erec; this place Junius understands for Aracca in Sushana; but there is also a City in Canagena, called Arace; and indeed, likelihood of name is no certain proof, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third City (called Chalne) some take it for Caliniss: of which Am. Mercellinus. S. Hieron takes it for Seleucia; Hieronymianus for Ctesiphon: others do think it to be the Agrani upon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Judge of this Dispute, who teacheth us directly, that these Cities are not seated in so diverse and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdom (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne in the Land of Shinaar: so as in the Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must find them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) think, with Viterbiensis, that these four made but one Babylon, than that they were Cities far removed, and in several Provinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalne from Babylon. Go you (saith Amos) to Chalne, and from thence go you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistines. The Geneva Translation, favouring the former Opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginal note expressing that Shinaar was here named, not that all these cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldea, from Babylon in Egypt: but I find little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire, there was no such Babylon, nor any City at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great City of Cairo, which was built long after, not far from the place where stood Memphis the ancient City, but not so ancient as Babylon upon Euphrates. Now, that Chalne is situate in the valley of Shinaar, it hath been formerly proved in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successive Kings.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive; and that it is probable, out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built Ur of the Chaldees.

NOW, as of Nimrod; so are the Opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great State of Babylon and Assyria: a controversy wearisomely disputed without any direct proof, conclusion, or certainty. But to me of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voice of reason hath the best hearing; the Interpretation of Junius is most agreeable; who, besides all necessary consequence, doth not disjoin the fence of the Scriptures therein, nor confuse the understanding thereof. For in this sort he converteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principium Regni ejus Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalne, in terra Shinaaris: e terra hac processit in Assyriam, ubi edificavit Niniven (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar: and he went forth of this Land into Assyria, and built Ninive. So as Junius takes Assur in this place, not for any Person, but for the Region of Assyria; the Land being so called in Moses time, and before it. For certainly, the other construction (where the word Assur is taken for Assur the Son of Shem) doth not answer the order which Moses observeth through all the Books of Genesis, but is quite contrary unto it. For, in the beginning of the tenth Chapter, he setteth down the Sons of Noah, in these words: Now these are the generations of the Sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, unto whom Sons were born after the Flood: then it followeth immediately; The Sons of Japheth were Gomer, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noah's Sons, be he eldest or youngest, because he was first to be spoken of: with whom (having last named him) he proceeds and sets down his Issue, and then the Issue of his Sons: first, the Issue of Gomer, Japheth's eldest Son; and then speaks of Javan and his Sons: for of the rest of that Family he is silent. Anon after, he numbereth the Sons of Ham, of which Chush was the eldest; and then the Sons of Chush and Mizraim; and afterwards of Canaan, leaving Shem for the last, because he would not disjoin the Story of the Hebrews. But after he beginneth with Shem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, unto

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus were three distinct Persons.

Benzo, and out of him Naucerus, with others, make many Nimrod's; Enfibus confounds him with Belus, and so doth Saint Hierom upon Ofz; and these words of Saint Augustine seem to make him of the same Opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Beli, qui primus illic regnaverat 65 annos; There did Ninus reign after the death of his father Belus, who governed in Babylon sixty five years. But it could not be unknown to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the Establisher of that Empire: Moses being plain and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom (saith he) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar; wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly, it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement), supposed; for in Ninus his time, the World was marvellously replenished. And if S. Augustine had undoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would have given him the name which the Scriptures give him, rather than have borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnaverat: who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words do not disprove that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Julius Caesar overthrew the liberty of the Romane Common-wealth, making himself perpetual Dictator; yet Augustus was the first established Emperour, and the first that reigned absolutely by sovereign Authority over the Romans, as an Emperour.

The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternity, laying the foundation of sovereign rule, as Caesar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with general allowance, exercised such a power. Peregrinus is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them, both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. years after the Flood (as they account) that Belus reigned; but such agreement of times proves it not. For, so Edward, the third, and his Grand-child, Richard, the second, were Kings both in one year: the one died; the other in the same year was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable than that of Mercator: who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For, it is plain, that the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom was Babel, and the Towns adjoining; but the first, and most famous work of Ninus, was the City of Ninive.

Now, whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus overcame and suppressed the Babylonians, the same rather proveth the contrary, than that Ninus and Nimrod were one Person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Ninive in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recovered again by strong hand; which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time.

—Dicitur akam

Colubibus muris cinxisse Semiramis Urbem.

Semiramis with walls of Brick, the City did inclose.

Further, where it is alleged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mighty; so Justine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercator's Arguments; it may be answered, that such an addition might have been given to many other Kings as well. For, if we may believe Justine, then were Mexoris King of Egypt, and Tanis of Scythia, mighty Kings before Ninus was born. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the undertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference between them.

For, whereas Mercator conceiveth, that it was too early, for any that lived about the time of the confusion of Languages, to have invaded and mastered those Cities so far removed from Babel, namely, Erech, Accad, and Chalne: which work he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest undertaking; and consequently would have Nimrod to have been long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one Person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I do not find that supposition true. That ever Nimrod invaded any of these Cities; but that he founded them, and built them from the ground, being the first after the Flood; that conducted the children of Noah into those parts; and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hand.

Besides, whereas these Cities, in many mens opinions, are found to stand far away from Babylon, I find no reason to bring me to that belief. The City of Accad, which the Septuagint calls Archad; and Epiphanius, Arpal; Junius takes it to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for for the Region thereabout, the Cosmographers (saith he) call Accabene for Accadene. Others understand Nisibis and Ninive, to be one City: so do Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Akkad, and Charran, are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accadene to be a Region of Mesopotamia; the same which Arias Montanus, out of S. Hierom, calls Achad: and so do the Hebrews also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the City of Erech, which the Septuagint call Orech; S. Augustine, Oreg; and Pagninus, Erech; this place Junius understands for Aracca in Susiana: but there is also a City in Camagena, called Arace; and indeed, likelihood of name is no certain proof, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third City (called Chalne) some take it for Calinis: of which Am. Mercellinus, S. Hierom takes it for Seleucia; Hieroglyphitanus for Ctesphon: others do think it to be the Agrani upon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Judge of this Dispute, who teacheth us directly, that these Cities are not seated in so diverse and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdom (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne in the Land of Shinaar: so as in the Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must find them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) think, with Viterbiensis, that these four made but one Babylon, than that they were Cities far removed, and in several Provinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalne from Babylon. Go you unto Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistines. The Geneva Translation, favouring the former Opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginal note expressing that Shinaar was here named, not that all these cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chalde, from Babylon in Egypt: but I find little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire, there was no such Babylon, nor any City at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great City of Cairo, which was built long after, not far from the place where stood Memphis the ancient City, but not so ancient as Babylon upon Euphrates. Now, that Chalne is situate in the valley of Shinaar, it hath been formerly proved in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and faccible Kings.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive; and that it is probable, out of Elay 23. 13. that Assur built Ur of the Chaldees.

NOW, as of Nimrod; so are the Opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great State of Babylon and Assyria: a controversy wearisomely disputed without any direct proof, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voice of reason hath the best hearing) the Interpretation of Junius is most agreeable; who, besides all necessary consequence, doth not disjoin the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confuse the understanding thereof. For in this sort he converteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principum Regni eius Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalne, in terra Shinaaris: e terra hac processit in Assyriam, ubi edificavit Niniven (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar: and he went forth of this Land into Assyria, and built Ninive. So as Junius takes Assur in this place, not for any Person, but for the Region of Assyria; the Land being so called in Moses time, and before it. For certainly, the other construction (where the word Assur is taken for Assur the Son of Shem) doth not answer the order which Moses observeth through all the Books of Genesis, but is quite contrary unto it. For, in the beginning of the tenth Chapter, he setteth down the Sons of Noah, in these words: Now these are the generations of the Sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, unto whom Sons were born after the Flood: then it followeth immediately; The Sons of Japheth were Gomer, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noah's Sons, be he eldest or youngest, because he was first to be spoken of: with whom (having last named him) he proceeds and sets down his Issue, and then the Issue of his Sons: first, the Issue of Gomer, Japheth's eldest Son; and then speaks of Javan and his Sons: for of the rest of that Family he is silent. Anon after, he numbereth the Sons of Ham, of which Chusht was the eldest: and then the Sons of Chusht and Mizraim; and after wards of Canaan, leaving Shem for the last, because he would not disjoin the Story of the Hebrews. But after he beginneth with Shem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber unto unto Abraham, and so to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to have brought in one of the Sons of Shem, in the middle of the Generations of Ham, had been against order; neither would Moses have past over so slightly the erection of the Assyrian Empire in one of the Sons of Shem, if he had had any such meaning: it being the Story of Shem's Sons, which he most attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the Sons of Chus, because he founded the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter, he returns to speak of the building of Babel in particular, having formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, so also in the eleventh he maketh no report of Shem, till such time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the Issue of Shem, which he continueth unto Abraham and Isaac. And of Junius opinion touching Assur, was Calvin: to which I conceive P. Comestor, in historia Scholastica, gave an entrance, who, after he had delivered this place in some other sense, he useth these words: Vel intelligendum non est de Assur, filio Sem, &c. sed Assur (id est, Regnum Assyriorum) inde egressum est, quod tempore Sarug proavi Abrahami factum est; (which is) Or else it is not to be understood of Assur the son of Sem, &c. but Assur (that is, the Kingdom of the Assyrians) came from thence (videlicet, from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of Sarug the great Grand-father of Abraham. After which he reconcilith the difference in this sort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod), to be the first Erector of the Assyrian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Respecting the beginning; but others conceive that it had beginning from Ninus, which is also true, Quantum ad Regni ampliationem. Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may add the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Assur to be the Son of Nimrod: and so doth Methodius, and Viterbiensis, Saint Hierom, and Cyrillus, and now lastly, Tornielus: who (saith he) took upon him that name of Assur after he had beaten the Assyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus, after his Conquest in Africa: and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Africa, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Psalm 81. Esay 10. Joel 5. &c. But to help the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the Son of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Archbishop of Mentz in the year of Christ 854. an ancient and Learned Writer, understands this place with Comestor, or Comestor with him, agreeing in substance with that Translation of Junius: to which words of Moses he giveth this sense: De hac terra Assyriorum pullulavit imperium, qui ex nomine Ninus, Beli filii, Ninum considerunt, utrum magnam, &c. Out of this Land grew the Empire of the Assyrians, who built Ninus the great City, so named of Ninus the Son of Belus. On the contrary, Calvin objecteth this place of Esay: Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, this was no People, Assur founded it by the inhabitants of the Wilderness; than which there is no one place in the Scriptures, that hath a greater diversity in the Translation and Understanding; inasmuch as Michael de Palatio upon Esay (though in all else very diligent) passeth it over. But Calvin seemeth hereby to infer, that because Assur founded the State of the Chaldeans, therefore also Assur, rather than Nimrod, established the Assyrian Empire, and built Nineve: contrary to the former translation of Junius; and to his own Opinion. Now, out of the Vulgar (called Hierom's Translation) it may be gathered, that Assur both founded and ruined this Estate or City of the Chaldeans; by Esay remembered: unto which City, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrians, that they cannot trust or hope for relief thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this City of Chaldaea, and that Estate, an example unto those Phenicians, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruine: which City of Chaldaea, being of strength, and carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Assyrians utterly wasted and destroyed: whereby he giveth them knowledge, and fore-telleth them, that their own City of Tyre (invincible, as themselves thought) should also soon after be overturned by the same Assyrians: as (indeed) it was by Nebuchodonosor. And these be the words after Hierom: Ecce terra Chaldaeorum, talis populus non fuit, Assur fundavit eam, in captivitate tradiderunt robustos ejus, suffoderunt domos ejus, posuerunt eam in ruinam (which is) Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, such a People there were not (or, this was no People, after the Geneva) Assur (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong men captive, they undermined their Houses, and ruined their City. The Septuagint express it but in a part of another Verse, in these words: Et in terra Chaldaeorum, & hac desolata est ab Assyriis, quoniam murus ejus corruit, making the sense perfect by the preceeding verse, which altogether may be thus understood: If thou go over to Chittim (which is Macedon, or Greece) yet yet thou shalt not rest (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldeans, for this is made desolate by the Assyrians, because their walls fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Vatablus convert it thus: Ecce terra Chaldaim, ipse populus non erat illic olim; nam Assur fundavit eam navibus, erexerunt arces illius; contriverunt ades ejus, posuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished: Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, this People was not once therein inhabiting: for Assur built it a harbour for ships; they erected the Towers thereof; and again brake down the houses thereof, and ruined it. Junius, in the place of Ships, sets the word (pro Barbaris) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Geneva, by the Barbarians: But this is undoubtedly, that the Prophet Esay (as may be gathered by all the sense of the Chapter) did therein assure the Tyrians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terror) he maketh choice to note the calamities of those places, Cities, and Regions, by whose trade the state and greatness of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tharsis, from the Macedonians, and other Grecians, under the name of Chittim; also by the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Mart Town of the World most renowned. And (as it appears in our Discourse of Paradise) not the least part of her chief merchandize came in by the City Dr, or Orchoa in Chaldaea, where the body or chief stream of Euphrates (even that stream which runneth through Babylon and Otris, which now falleth into Tygris) had his passage into the Persian Gulf: though now it be stopped up. For, as we have heretofore noted, the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Raamah) dwelling on the East banks of the Persian Gulf, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charan, and Chalde did) transported their merchandize by the mouth of Tygris, that is, from Teredon; and of Euphrates, that is, from Dr, or Orchoa: and then by Babylon, and thence by River and over Land, they conveyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre, as they do this day to Aleppo. So then Dr of the Chaldees was a Port Town, and one of those Cities which had Intelligence, trade, and exchange with the Tyrians: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldaea, through which that part of Euphrates ran, which passage is now stopp'd up. Ejus cursum vestigia aboluit (saith Niger.) And Pliny: Locis ubi Euphratis ostium fuit, flumen salsum; Time hath worn away the channel of Euphrates: the place where the mouth thereof was, is a Bay of salt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probability) we may expound the City of the Chaldees, whose calamities Esay here noteth for terror of the Tyrians, to be the City anciently called Dr, and by Hebraeae, Camerias; by Ptolemy, Orchoa; and by the Greeks, Chaldeopolis, the City of Chaldaea: which the Sons of Shem, until Abraham's time, inhabited. And whereas in all the Translations, it is said, that Assur both founded it and ruined it: it may be understood, that Assur the Founder was the Son of Shem; and Assur the destroyers were the Assyrians, by whom those that inhabited Dr of Chaldaea, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God fore-seeing, commanded Abraham thence to Carran, and so into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Pagninus converted (by Ships) do bear that sense, the same may be the better approved, because it was a Port Town: and the River so farr up as this City of Dr was in ancient time navigable, as both by Pliny and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no less manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desert were and are the confronting, and next People of all other unto it. For Chaldaea is now called Arachaldar, which significeth Desert Lands, because it joineith to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Thureans) addeth, that they are, of all other People, the most Salvage; calling them Homines omnium maximè barbaros.

So as this place of Esay, which breedeth some doubt in Calvin, proveth in nothing the contrary Opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former Translation of Junius, nor the Interpretation of Comestor and Rabanus. For though other men have not conceived (for any thing that I have read) that Assur is in this place diversly taken (as for the Son of Shem, when he is spoken of as a Builder of Dr; and when as a Destroyer thereof, then for the Assyrian Nation) yet certainly the evidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seem to enforce it. And so this Founding of the City of the Chaldees by Assur (into which the most of the Posterity of Shem that came into Shinar, and were separate for the Idolatry of the Chusites and Nimrodians, retired themselves) hath nothing in it to prove the same Assur built Nineve, or that the same Assur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Assur, who was the Son of Shem, both an Idolater, and the Son of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the first notorious sacrificer to Idols; and the first that set up a Statue or Image to be honoured as God. Now, if Assur must be of that Race, Race, and not of the Family of Shem, as he must be, if he founded Ninive, then all those which seek to give him the honour thereof, do him by a thousand parts more injury, by taking from him his true Parents and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Assur, whom they make the Founder of Ninive (and so the Son of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainly, he was very unworthy, and obscure, and not like to be the Founder of such an Empire, and such a City, if no man have vouchsafed to leave to Posterity his expulsi- on thence, and how he lost that Empire again, or quitted it to Ninus: whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) far differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason; and best agreeing with the Story of that Age written by prophane Authours, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalde; the first works and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses; and that these works being finished within the Valley of Shinar; he looked farther abroad, and set in hand the work of Ninus, lying near unto the same stream that Babel and Chalde did: to which work his Grand-child Ninus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus's wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to pass, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundress of the City which she onely finished: so also Ninus of Ninive: Quam quidam Babylonem potuit instaurare; Sæ mighi repa- ir or renew Babylon, saith S. Augustine. For so did Nebuchodonosor vaunt himself to be the Founder of Babylon also, because he built up again some part of the wall, over-born by the fury of the River: which work of his stood till Alexander's time, whereupon he vaunted thus: Is not this great Babel which I have built?

§. IV.

Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known.

BUT to return to the Story, it is plain in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfugium, and Julius Africanus furnished Saturnus) was the establisher of the the Babylonian Monarchy, of whom there is no other thing written, than that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those four Cities before remembred; Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalde; and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Affria, and in Affria built four more Cities (to wit) Ninive, Rehoboth, Celch, and Refen. And seeing that he spent much time in building Babel, Erech, and those adjoining; and that his travels were many ere he came into Shinar; that work of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Ninive, and the other Cities of Affria which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficulty than any thing performed by his Successors in many years after: to whose undertakings time had given so great an increase of Peoples, and the examples and patterns of his beginning, so great advancement and encouragement: in whole time (saith Glycas) all these Nations (were called Aeropes, a Semeticus linguam ter- raque divisone; By reason that the earth and the speech were then divided.

Belus, or Bel, or Jupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114. years, of whose acts and undertakings there is little written: For it is thought that he spent much of his time in disburdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firm ground of all those great Fens and over- flown Marshes which adjoined unto it. For any of his Wars or Conquests there is no report, other than of his begun enterprise against Sabatus King of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia, which Diodorus calls Scythia Sæga, whose Son and Successor Baranes became subject and Tributary to Ninus, that followed the War to effect, which was by his Father Belus begun.

§. V.

That we are not to marvel how so many Kingdoms could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia.

THAT so many Kingdoms were erected in all those Eastern parts of the World so soon after Nimrod (as by the Story of Ninus is made manifest) the causes were threefold (namely) Opportunity, Example, and Necessity. For Opportunity, being a Prince liberal and powerfull, bestoweth on her first Entertainers many times more benefits, than either Fortune can, or Wildom ought; by whose preference alone the understanding minds of men receive all those helps and supplies, which they either want or wish for: so as every Leader of a troop (after the division of Tongues, and dispersion of People) finding these fair offers made unto them, held the power which they possessed, and and governed by discretion all those People, whom they conducted to their desired places. For, it cannot be conceived, that when the Earth was first divided, mankind straggled abroad like Beasts in a Desert; but that by agreement they disposed themselves; and undertook to inhabit all the known parts of the World, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinar, which had Kings, and were Peopled in Ninus's time, would not have been possesed in many hundreds of years after, as then they were; neither did those that were sent, and travelled far off (order being the true Parent of prosperous success) undertake so difficult enterprises without a Conductor or Commander. Secondly, the example of Nimrod, with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every humour that aspired. Thirdly, Necessity resolved all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enjoy the harvest of their own Travels; nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible violence; nor those which sought alter any proportion of greatness, either possess the same in quiet, or rule and order their own Ministers and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the undertakings and Conquests of Ninus (the Son of Belus) made it apparent; for he found every where Kings and Monarchies, what way soever his Ambition led him in the Wars.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no companion King, to us known, when he first took on him Sovereignty and sole commandment of all those the Children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his life-time others also raised themselves to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his Son and Successor) found Sabatus King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerfull to resist his attempts; which Sabatus I take to be the same, which Justinus calls Tanais, and should conjecture, that Altiarnus had been his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error (as Justinus placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seems to me, rightly accounted by the Judicious and Learned Reinccius, all one with the great Sesagris, that lived certain Ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65. years, according to the common account.

§. VI.

Of the name of Belus, and other names affines unto it.

WHENCE this second King and Successor of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus, question hath been made; for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) given by Ninus, than assumed by Belus himself.

Cyrrillus against Julian calls the Father of Ninus, Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all men that cauled himself to be called a god: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence derived. But Bel, as many Writers have observed, signifieth the Sun in the Chaldean Tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Semiramis give that name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sun; which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by divers others of the Chaldean Princes and Babylonian Satraps: so was it used (in imitation) by the chief of the Assyrians and other Nations, as some Historians have conceived.

To this Bel, or Belus, pertain (as in affinity) those voices of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Beelphegor, Beelzebub, and Beelshamon. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldean; convert the word Baal by the Latine, Principes militie, Chief in the Wars; though Daniel was so called (saith Suidas) Ob bonorum explicationis arcanorum rerum; Inter in honor of his expounding secrets. Saint Hieronymus makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to have the same signification; and saith, that the Idol of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memory of his Father set up to be worshipped: to which, that he might add the more honour and reverence, he made it a Sanctuary and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Justinus) came Idolatry, and the first use of Images into the World. Isidore doth interpret Beel by Petrus, old, or ancient; adding, that as among the Affrians it is taken for Saturnus; and the Sun: so, in the Phœnic or Carthaginian Language, it signifieth God: Glycas makes it an Affrian name properly; and Josephus a Tyrin. He also affirmeth, that the Idol which the Assyrians worshipped (by them erected on the Mountain Phegor, or Peor; and called Baal) is the same which the Latines call Priapus, the god of Gardens; which also was the Opinion of Saint Off. Hieronymus. But, that the word Bel, or Beel, &c. was as much to say, as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the Idol of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel foundeth (God) and Sebul (Files (Flies or Hornets) by which name (notwithstanding) the Jews express the Prince of Devils. But the Prophet Ose teacheth us the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himself; And at that day (saith the Lord) thou shalt call me Ithi, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. For, although the name of Baal, or Bahal, be justly to be used towards God; yet in respect that the same was given to Idols, God hath hated it, and forbid it. And the using of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the Sun, was not, because it properly signifieth the Sun, but because the Sun there was worshipped as God: as a also the Fire was; tantum Solis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembered) as Belphegor, and Belphebon; Belphebon is expounded out of Faciens; Dominus seculæ, valus faciens: The Lord of the Watch-tower, or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idol, and the place wherein it was worshipped. It is written Belpheor, or Baalpeor: and Peor (they say) is as much as Demondavit; and therefore the word joined, expresseth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus, the Son of Saturn: for it was used among the Ancients, to name the Father Saturn, the Son Jupiter, and the Grand-child Hercules. Saturni dicuntur familiarum Nobilissimæ, Regumque qui urbes considerant sanctissimæ; primogeniti eorum Joves & Junones; Hercules vero nepotes eorum fortissimæ. The ancientest of Noble Families and Kings which founded Cities, are called Saturni; their first-born, Jupiter and Junoes; their valiant Nephews, Hercules. But this Belus (saith L. Vives) was famous by reason of his Warlike Son, Ninus, who caused his Father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Jupiter Babylonius, whom the Egyptians (transported by Dreams of their Antiquities) make one of theirs. For Neptune (ay they) upon Lybia the Daughter of Epaphus, begat this Jupiter Belus, who was Father to Aegyptus. They add, that this Belus, carrying a Colony to the River of Euphrates, there built a City, in which he ordained Priests after the Egyptian manner. But, were there any Belus the Son of Epaphus and Isis, or of Neptune and Lybia, or (with Eusebius) of Teglonus, who after the death of Apis married Isis (Cecrops then reigning in Athens) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom we speak, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Egyptians so much vaunted.

Of the worshipping of Images, begun from Belus in Babel.

AS for the Babylonians Belus, he was the most ancient Belus, and the Inventor of Astronomy; if Pliny say true: from whence the Egyptians might borrow both the name and doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the same Author affirmeth, that it did remain in his time.

Of the Sepulchre of Belus, Strabo writeth thus: *Over the River, saith he, there are Gardens, where they say the ruins of Belus his Tomb, which Xerxes brake up, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramid made of Brick, as far long high, and on every side it had a farlong in breadth. It appears by Cyril against Julian, that he obtained divine worship by living; for so he writes of him (calling him Arbelus). Arbelus, vir superbus & arrogantissimus hominum dictus à subditis Deitatis nomen accepisse: Perseveravit igitur Assyrii, & finitima illis gentes sacrificantes ei. Arbelus, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was ever honoured by their subjects with title of Deity; (or with the name of God) the Assyrians therefore, and the bordering Nations have persevered, sacrificing to him. Even Arins also, whom Suidas calls Therxes, who succeeded next after Ninus, was made an idol-God among them, if we credit Suidas.*

After Ninus (that is, after Ninias) Thamas reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars; a man of sharp and fierce disposition, who bidding battle to Caucasus, of the stock of Japheth, slew him. The Assyrians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal; that is, Mars; thus far Suidas. Nekhes is it unlikely; but that any among Idolatrous Nations were Deified in their life-times, or soon after: though I deny not, but that the most of their Images and Statues were first erected without divine worship, only in memory of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Olycus rightly conceiveth and so afterward the Devil crept into those wooden and brazen carcases, when Posterity had lost the memory of their first invention. Hereof Isidore speaketh in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deos affirmant, homines fuerunt, & pro uniuscujusque vita meritis vel magnificentia, coli apud suos post mortem ceperunt: sed (Damianus) persuadentibus) quos illi pro sua memoria honoraverunt, minores Deos existimabant: ad ista vero magis excolenda accesserunt Poetarum fignenta;

They

They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans affirmed to be gods: and every one for his merits or magnificence, began after his death to be honoured of his own: But, at length (the Devils persuading) they accounted them lesser gods, whose memories they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the Opinions (concerning the honour of the dead) much more superstitious.

And, that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth; but Gregory: Gentilis (saith he) inventrix & caput est Imaginum; Gentilism is the inventress and ground of Images: and Ambrose: Gentilium adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei; The Gentiles adore wood, as it were the Image of God. Eusebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of images, a custom borrowed of the Heathen. The like saith S. Augustine against Adimantus. Et veretur (saith Laurentius) ne Religio vana sit, si nihil vidant quod adoret; They fear their Religion would be vain, should they not see what they worship.

And out of doubt the Scholemen shew this fearful custom very strangely. For, seeing the very workmanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wife Christiana satisfy it self with the distinction of Dontia, and Hyperdontia, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should strain their wits to defend the use of those things, which the Scriptures have not only no where warranted, but expressly in many places forbidden, and curbed the practitioners thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Devil was so strongly and subtilly rooted, as neither express the Commandment of God himself, Thou shalt not make any graven Image, nor all the threatening of Moses and the Prophets after him, could remove, weed it, or by fear, or by any persuasions lead the hearts of men from it. For, where shall we find words of greater weight, or plainer instruction than these? Take therefore good heed to your selves (for ye saw no Image: in the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb, out of the midst of the fire) that ye corrupt not your selves, and make you a graven Image, or representation of any Figure, whether it be the likeness of Male or Female.

And, besides the express Commandment, Thou shalt make thee no graven Image, and the prohibition of many Scriptures, so it is written in the Book of Wisdom, That the invention of Idols was the beginning of Whoredom; and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for ever.

And whereas the Scholemen affirm, that the Prophets spake against the Worshipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest, that Moses spake of Images of the living God, and not of Baal, and the rest of that nature. For you saw no Image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Basil: Noli aliquam in idola formam imaginari, ne circumspicias cum mente tua: Do not imagine any form to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy mind too. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption unlawful to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts and minds, how far do those men presume, that put him under the greafie Pencil of a Painter, or the rusty Axe or other Instrument of a Carpenter or Carver?

For as this dishonour to the infinite and incomprehensible God, began in Babel: so did the Devil transport and spread this invention into all the Regions adjoining, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romans, for a while, resisted the erection of these Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 170. years; observing the Law of Numa, who thought it impertinent to resemble things most beautifully, by things most base. But, Tarquinius Priscus afterwards prevailing, and following the vanity of the Greeks (a Nation of all others under the Sun most devoted by Satan) set up the Images of their gods; which (as S. Augustine witnesseth) that learned Varro both bewailed, and utterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth; *Simulacra deorum venerantur, illis supplicat, genus positum illa adorant; & cum hæc suspicant, fabros, qui illa fecere, continentur; The Images of the gods are worshipped, those they pray unto, with bended knees those they adore; and while they so greatly admire them, they condemn the Handicraftsmen that made them: which also Sedulius the Poet in this sort scoteth at:*

Hæc miseri qui vana colunt, qui corde sinistro Religiosa sibi se suspiciunt simulacra, summeque Fædorem fuggunt, & que fecere, venerantur! Quis furor est? que tanta animi dementia Induit?
Ut volucrem, turpemque bovem, torquumque Draconem, semihominemque canem supplex homo pronus adoret.

Alas wretched they that worship vanity: And consecrate dumb Idols in their houses: Who their own Maker, God on their side, despise, And fear the work of their own hands as God!

What

(Flies or Hornets) by which name (notwithstanding) the Jews express the Prince of Devils. But the Prophet Ose teacheth us the prophet signification of this word from the voice of God himself; And at that day (saith the Lord) thou shalt call me Ithi, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. Alh wretched they that worship vanities, And consecrate dumb Idols in their heart, Who their own Maker/God on high despise, And fear the work of their own hands & art!

V What

What fury? what great madness doth beguile Mens minds? that man should ugly shapes adore
Of Birds, or Bulls, or Dragons, or the vile Half-dog-half-man on knees for aid implored.

And though this device was barbarous, and first, and many years practised by Heathen Nations onely, till the Jews were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorn the ignorant stupidity of his Nation; but Justin Martyr remembereth how the Sybil in how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the souls of men to erect and adore those bables. Strabo and Herodotus witness, that the Perfians did not erect or set up any Statue of their Gods. Lycurgus never taught in the Lacedaemonians, but thought it impiecy to represent immortal natures by mortal Figures. Rufinus also witnesseth, in his Sixth Book, de preparatione Evangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brachmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The same do Tacitus and Crinus report of the ancient Germani. Many other Authors might be remembered, that witness the disdain which the Heathen themselves had of this childish Idolatry; of which Hospius hath written at large in his Tract, de origine imaginum. And it was truly said, Omnia mala exempla bonis initiis orta sunt, All ill examples have sprung from good beginnings. The Heathen, at first, made these Statues and Images, but in memory of such remarkable men, as had deserved best of their Countries and common-wealths: Effigies hominum (saith Pliny) non solebant exprimi, nisi aliqua illustri causa perpetuitatem mererentur: Men are not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to be perpetually remembered. And though of the more antique Papists, some have borrowed of the Gentiles (as appears in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra are pro elementis iterarum, ut per ea discerent homines Deum invisibilem cognoscere: Images (say they, and so before them the Heathen said) are in stead of Letters, whereby men might learn to know the invisible God: in which understanding, perhaps, they no otherwise esteemed them than pictures indeed; yet as that of Babel, or Bel, set up in memory of Belus the Babylonian, became afterward the most revered Idol of the world, by which so many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himself) were misled and cast away: so those very stocks and stones, and painted canvases (called the pictures of Christ, our Lady, and others) were by thousands of ignorant people, not onely adored, but esteemed to have life, motion, and understanding. On these stocks we call (saith the Book of Wisdom) when we pass through the raging waves, on these stocks more rotten than the ship that carries us.

This Heathen invention of Images became so fruitful in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods, that they were forced to distinguish them into degrees and orders, as Dii consentes, seu majorum gentium selecti, Patritii, inferiores, dii medii: Consulting gods, or gods of the mightiest Nobility, select gods, Patritii, gods of mark, and Common gods (which the Romans called Medioximi) dii inferi, and terrestrial Heroes, and multitudes of other gods, of which S. Augustine hath made large mention, in his Book, de Civitate Dei. But (saith Lactantius) among all those miserable souls, and rotten bodies, worshipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretensis (by what good Angel moved I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the unknown God, which stood with the same title and dedication, even to the times of S. Paul: who made them first know to whom these Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might discern the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth every man, and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the Devil had so many years led and misled them. And it sufficed not that the multitude of these gods was so great in general, or that every Nation had some one which took particular and singular care of them, as Jupiter in Crete, Isis in Egypt, in Athens, Minerva, in Samos, Juno, in Paphos, Venus, and so of all other parts; but every City, and almost every Family, had a god apart. For as it is written in the second of Kings, the men of Babel made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Ashima, and the Avites made Nibhaz and Tartak, and the Sepharvaim burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech. All which, how plainly hath the Prophet Ezra derided? Men cut down Trees, rind them, burn a part of them, make ready their meat, and warm themselves by the fire thereof, and of the residue he maketh a god; an Idol, and prayeth unto it: but God hath shut their eyes from sight, and their heart from understanding. It is therefore safest for a Christian, to believe the Commandments of God, to direct against Idolatry, to believe the Prophets, and to believe S. Paul, who speaketh thus plainly and feelingly, My beloved, flee from Idolatry: I speak as unto them which have understanding, judge ye what I say.

Of the Wars of Ninus: and lastly, of his War against Zoroaster.

UNTO this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commanded the exercise of Idolatry, the first that injuriously invaded his Neighbour Princes, and the first that, without shame or fear, committed Adultery in publick. But, as of Belus there is no certain memory (as touching particulars) so of this Ninus (whose Story is gathered out of profane Authors) I find nothing to warrantable, but that the same may be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For, although that piece of Berosus, set out and commented upon by Annus, hath many good things in it, and giveth great light (as Chrysostom noteth) to the understanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halicarnassus, and others: yet, Lodovicus Vicer, B. Rhenanus, and others after them, have laid open the imperfection and defects of the Fragment; proving directly, that it cannot be the same Berosus which lived in Alexander's time, cited by Athenens and Josephus: and whose Statue the Athenians erected, saith Pliny. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many have gathered the succession of the Babylonian and Assyrian Princes, even from Ninrod, to the eighteenth King Astades, and to the times of Josiah. For of Metasthenes an Historian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certain Papers; or some few lines of the Chaldean and Assyrian Monarchies: but he afterwards, in the collection of the Persian Kings, is not without his errors.

Ctesias, or Cnidus (a City joining to Halicarnassus) who lived together with Cyrus the younger, and with Artaxerxes Menemon, gathered his History out of the Persian Records, and reacheth as far upwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and, though in the Story of Cyrus the younger, Xenophon approveth him in some things, and Athenens, Pausanias, and Tertullian cite him; yet so base and apparent are his flatteries of the Times and Princes with whom he lived, and so incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as whatsoever his reports were, times have consumed his Works, leaving some very few excerpts lately published.

And therefore in things uncertain, seeing a long discourse cannot be pleasing to men of judgment, I will pass over the acts of this third Assyrian, in as few words as I can express them. S. Augustine affirms, that Ninus mastered all Asia, India excepted. Others say that he wan it all, save India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Arcus of Arabia, the companion of his Conquests, with whom he entered into a straight league of amity, because he commanded many people; and was his kinsman, and a Chusite, and the nearest Prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprise was upon Syria, which he might easily subdue, both because he invaded it on the sudden, and because it lay next him: and also because the Arabians and their King Arcus (which bordered Syria) assisted him in the Conquest thereof.

The King of Armenia, Baranes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aid him in his War against Zoroaster: for from Armenia, he bent himself that way toward the East; but, that ever he commanded the lesser Asia, I do not believe, for none of his Successors had any possession therein.

His third War was against Tharnus, King of the Medes, whom it is said that he overthrew, and cruelly murdered with his seven Children, though others affirm, that they all died in one battle against him. Whether he invaded Zoroaster before the building or amplifying of Ninive, or after, it is uncertain. It is said, that he made two Expeditions into Bactria: and, that finding little or ill success in the first, he returned, and set the work of Ninive forward: and then a second time entered Bactria with 1700000 Foot, and 200000 Horse, and 100000 fix hundred Chariots: being encountered by Zoroaster with four hundred thousand. But Ninus prevailing, and Zoroaster being slain, he entered farther into the Countrey, and besieged the chief City thereof, called Bactra, or Bactrian (saith Stephanus) which by a passage found, and an assault given by Semiramis (the Wife of Menon) he entered and possessed. Upon this occasion Ninus both admiring her judgment and valour, together with her person and external beauty, lanced her so strongly, as neglecting all Princely respects) he took her from her Husband, whose eyes he threatened to thrust out, if he refused to consent. He therefore yielding to the passion of love in Ninus, and to the passion of sorrow in himself, by the strong persuasions of shame and dishonour, cast himself headlong into the Water, and died.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to have been the chief Author of Magick Arts: and of the divers kinds of Magick.

That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first inventor of Astrologie, or of Magick: and that there were divers great Magicians of this name.

Zoroaster, King of the Bactrians, Vincensius supposeth to be Cham the Son of Noah: a fancy of little probability. For Cham was the Paternal Ancestor of Ninus, the Father of Chur, the Grand-father of Nimrod, whose Son was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincensius had heard of that Book which was called Scriptura Cham, devised by some wicked Kave, and so entailed; of which Sixtus Senensis hath made the due mention.

It is reported by Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gave the invention of Magick to Cham the Son of Noah: so did Comestor in his Scholastical History: which Art (saith he) with the seven Liberal Sciences he writ in fourteen Pillars: seven of which were made of Brasse, to resist the defacing by the Waters of the Flood; and seven of Brick, against the Injury of fire. There was also another devised Discourse, which went under the title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like this of Comestor. These be Cassianus words: Cham (filius Noah) qui superstitiosis istis & sacrisque fuit artibus infectus, scitens nullum se posse super his memorabilem librum in Arcam proferre inferre, in qua erat cum patre iusto, &c. Cham the (the Son of Noah) who was infected with these superstitions and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any Book, or memorial of that nature into the Ark, wherein he was to remain with his godly Father, caused the Precepts and Rules thereof to be graven in Metal, and hard Stone.

Saint Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to have laught at his birth, when all other children weep; which prefiged the great knowledge which afterward he attained unto; being taken for the Inventor of natural Magick and other Arts; for the Corrupter, saith Pliny and Justine. But I do not think that Zoroaster invented the doctrine of the Horoscopes, or Nativities: or first found out the nature of Herbs, Stones, and

Minerals, or their Sympathetical, or Antipathetical workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldea is also made the Inventor. I rather think that these knowledge were far more ancient, and left by Noah to his Sons. For Abraham, who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster (as Josephus reporteth) was no less learned herein than any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then living: differing from the wisdom of after-times in this, that he knew, and acknowledged, the true cause, and giver of life and virtue, to Nature, and all natural things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and universal power) admired the Instruments, and did attribute proper strength to the things themselves (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisdom, which being one, and remaining in it self, can do all things, and reneweth all.

Now, whether this Zoroaster (overthrown by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Ctesias calls Oxyartes, whom Pliny finds of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a Spirit (being in the midst of his Disciples), as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slain by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger.

Again, Josephus, and Cedrenus affirm, that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandering Stars, and other motions of the Heavens: for if this Art had been invented by Zoroaster, he could not have attained to any such excellency therein, in his own life-time; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular judgment, he might add somewhat to this kind of knowledge, and leave it by writing to Posterity.

But of this Zoroaster, there is much dispute: and no less jangling about the word and Art of Magick. Arnobius remembereth four, to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zoroastres was given: which by Hermodorus and Dion seemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of art, and and was as much to say, as Astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus overthrew: the second, a Chaldean, and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaster Pamphylinus, who lived in the time of Cyrus, and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the nephew of Hofianes, which followed Xerxes into Greece; between whom and Cyrus, were past three score and eighteen years. Suidas remembereth a fifth, called Peromedus sapiens; and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster, the Son of Oromasdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now, of what Nation the first and chief Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Pliny and Lactantius make him a Persian. Gemisthenes, Platbo, Ficinus, and Steuchius, make him a Chaldean. But by those Books of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the Author of them was a Chaldean by Nation, though the word (Chaldean) was as often given to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishing of Nations. Tartarphyrus makes the Chaldei and Magi divers; Picus, the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldean both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Books, which (saith Picus) were written in the Chaldean Tongue; and the Comment in the same Language. Now, that the Magi and they were not differing it may be judged by the name of those Books of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he saith, to be intituled, Patrie Ezre Zoroastria & Melchior magorum oracula.

§. II.

Of the name of Magia; and that it was anciently far divers from Conjuring and Witchcraft.

Now, for Magick it self; which Art (saith Mirandula) Pauci intelligent, multi reprehendunt: Few understand, and many reprehend; Et sicut Canes ignotos semper allatant; As Dogs bark at those they know not: so they condemn and hate the things they understand not: I think it not amiss (leaving Ninus for a while) to speak somewhat thereof.

It is true, that many men abhor the very name and word (Magos) because of Simon Magus, who being indeed, not Magus, but goes (that is) familiar with evil Spirits, usurped that Title. For Magick, Conjuring, and Witchery, are far differing Arts, whereof Pliny being ignorant, scoffeth thereat. For Nero (saith Pliny) who had the most excellent Magicians of the East, sent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdom by his grace, found the Art, after long study and labour, altogether ridiculous.

Magus is a Persian word primitively, where-by is exprest such a one as is altogether conversant in things Divine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the Art of Magick is the Art of worshipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his Epistles expounding the word (magus) saith, that the Persians called their gods magi: whence, he addeth, that Magus, is either magus sapiens, or magus sapiens (that is) that Magus is, a name sometimes of him that is a God by nature; sometimes of him that is in the service of Gods; in which latter sense it is taken, Mat. 2. v. 1. And this is the first and highest kind: which Piccolominia calleth divine Magick: and these did the Latines newly entitle sapienter, or Wisemen. For the Persians, and worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These Wisemen the Greeks call Philosophers: the Indians, Branchinians; which name they somewhat needly retain to this day, calling their Priests Branchins; among the Aegyptians they were termed Priests with the Hebrews they were called Cahadsis, Prophetas, Scribas, and Pharisaeas: amongst the Babylonians they were denominated by the name of Chaldeans: and among the Persians, Magicians: of whom Arnobius (speaking of Hofianes, one of the ancient Magicians) useth these words: Et verum Deum merita majestate profectum, & Angelos ministros Dei, sed veri ejus venerationi novit assere. Idem demonas pedit terrenas, vagos; humanitatis inimicos; sophenes (for so M. Felix called him, not Hofianes) ascribeth the due Majesty to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his Angels are ministers and messengers which attend the Worship of the true God. He also hath delivered that there are Devils, earthly, and wandering, and enemies to man-kind.

His Majesty also, in his first Book of Demologiae, ch. 3. acknowledgeth, that in the Persian Tongue the word (Magus) imports as much a contemplator of divine and heavenly Science; but unjustly so called, because the Chaldeans were ignorant of the true Divinity. And it is also right which His Majesty avoweth, that under the name of Magick, all other unlawfull Arts are comprehended, and yet doth His Majesty distinguish it from Necromancy, Witchcraft, and the rest: of all which he hath written largely, and most learnedly. For the Magick which His Majesty condemneth, is of that kind whereof the Devil is a party. Daniel in his second Chapter nameth four kinds of those Wisemen: Arioli, Magi, Malefici, and Chaldei. Arioli the old Latine Translation calleth Sophists: Patalas and Paganus, Gentiliculus, or Physicos, or Philosophers, Philosophers, or (according to the note of Vatablus) Naturalists: Nempe sunt Magi apud Babaros, quod Philosophi apud Græcos (scilicet) divinarum humanarumque rerum scientiam, proficentes; For the Magi are for the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Grecians (that is) men that profess the knowledge of things both divine and humane. The Greek and the English call them Inchanters; Junius, Magicians; Cassiodorus, Conjurers: in the Syrian, they are all four by one name called Sapientes Babylonis; The Wisemen of Babel.

The second sort Vatablus, Pagani, Junius, and our English, call Astrologers; Hieronymus and the Septuagint, Magicians.

The third kind are Malefici or Venefici; in Hieronymus, Pagani, and the Septuagint, Witches, or Poisoners; in Junius, Præstigiatores, or Sorcerers, as in English.

That Witches are also rightly so called Venefici, or Poisoners; and that indeed there is a kind of Malefici, which, without any Art of Magick or Necromantie, use the help of the Devil to do mischief, His Majesty confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Book: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their practice, to mix the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Devil prepared; and at other times to make Pictures of Wax, or Clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things which the Devil by other means bringeth to pass.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldeans: who took upon them to foretell all things to come, as well natural as humane, and their evens; and this they vaunted to perform by the influences of the Stars, by them observed, and understood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are, the corruptions, which have made odious the very name of Magick, having chiefly fought (as is the manner of all Impostures) to counterfeit the highest and most noble part of it, yet so as they have all crept into the inferior degrees.

A second kind of Magick, was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kinds of Agriculture and Husbandry: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Stars into those lower Elements.

Philo Judeus goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magick, or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Stars, and other heavenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he lived in Chaldea: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognovit Creatorem (saith Jo. Damascenus) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Iosephus reporteth of Abraham, that he instructed the Egyptians in Arithmetic and Astronomie, who before Abraham's coming unto them knew none of these Sciences.

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo, in defence of Atrandula against Garsie: Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quid Abraham sanctitate & sapientia omnium præstantissimus, Chaldaeis primum, deinde Phœnicibus, deinde Egyptiis sacerdotes Astrologie & divina docuerit; Alexander (saith he, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon affirm, that Abraham, the holiest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldeans, then the Phœnicians; lastly, the Egyptian Priests; Astrologie, and divine Knowledge.

The third kind of Magick containeth the whole Philosophy of Nature; not the brabblings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost virtues, and draweth them out of Nature's hidden bosome to humane use: Virtutes in centro centri latentes; Virtutes hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort were Albertus, Arnoldus de villa nova, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these, in elder-times, and who better understood the power of Nature, and how to apply things that work to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyaneus, remembered by S. Hierom to Paulinus; in some mens Opinion, Numa Pompilius among the Romans; among the Indians, Theffian; among the Egyptians, Hermes; among the Babylonians, Budda; the Thracians had Zamolxis; the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abbaris; and the Italians, Petrus Apollonensis. The Magick, which these men profess, is thus defined: Magia est connexio a viro sapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus, sibi congruenter respondentibus, ut inde operadeant, non sine eorum sine admiratione qui causam ignorant: Magick is the connexion of natural agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wise man, so the bringing forth of such effects as are wonderful to those that know not their causes. In all these three kinds, which other men divide into four, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned; especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesseth God to be the Creator of the Universal: he believeth of the * Trinity, which he could not investigate by any natural knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: approveth the immortality of the Soul: teacheth Truth; Faith, Hope, and Love, discoursing of the Abstinence and Charity of the Magi: which Oracles of his, Vissalus, Ficinus, Patritius, and others, have gathered and translated.

Of

Of this Zoroaster, Ensch, in the Theologie of the Phœnicians, using Zoroaster's own words: Hec ad verbum scribit (saith Enschius) Dens primus incorruptibilis, sempiternus, ingenuus, expertus partium, sibi ipsi similis, bonorum omnium auriga, universa non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus, pater juris, sine doctrina iustitiam perditur, natura perfectus, sapiens, sacra natura unicus inventor, &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster, word for word, God, the first incorruptible, everlasting, ungetten without parts, most like himself, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, having learned justice without teaching, perfect, wise by nature, the solely inventor thereof.

Sextus Senensis, speaking of the wisdom of the Chaldeans, doth distinguish those wise men into five orders (to wit) Chascedim, or Chaldeans; Asaphim, or Magicians; Chartumim (which he translates Ariales, or sephists); Dechaphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Poisoners; and Gazarim, Angures, or Aruspices, or Diviners.

Chascedim were those which had the name of Chaldeans, which were Astronomers: Hi celorum motus diligentissimi spectantur; These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heavens: whom Philo, in the life of Abraham describeth.

Asaphim were in the old Latine translation called Philosophers: of the Septuagint, and of Hierom, Magicians: Qui de omnium tam divinarum quam humanarum rerum causis Philosophati sunt; Who discoursed of the causes of all things, as well divine as humane: of whom Origen makes Balaam (the Son of Beer) to be the first; but Laertius ascribeth the invention of this Art to Zoroaster the Persian.

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith S. Augustine, Pliny, and Iustine) of another Zoroaster: who corrupted the admirable wisdom of the Magi, which he received from his Ancestors:

Dechaphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those which we have spoken already out of His Majesty's Book of Demonologia.

Gazarim, or Aruspices (after S. Hierom) which divine from the entrails of Beasts slain for sacrifices: or by Gazarim, others understand Angures, who divine by the flying, singing, or feeding of Birds.

By this distinction, we may perceive the difference between those wise men which the Kings of Babylon entertained; and that the name and profession of the Magi among the ancient Persians was most honest. For as Pencer truly observeth, Præstant religionis Persæ, ut in populo Dei Levitæ, studijque vera Philosophi diditi erant: nec quisquam Rex Persarum poterat esse, qui non antea Magorum disciplinam scientiamque percepisset; The Magi (saith he) were the chief Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Levites among Gods people, and they were given to the studies of true Philosophy: neither could any be King of the Persians, who had not first been exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. Sextus Senensis, in the defence of Origen against Polychronus and Theophilus, hath two kinds of Magick, his own words are these: Est enim movens præmissa Polychroni & Theophili testimonia, sciendum est duplicem esse Magiam: alteram ubique ab Origine damnatam, que per fœdera cum demonibus inita, aut verè, aut apparenter operatur; alteram ab Origine laudatam, que ad præctice naturalis Philosophiæ pervenit, docens admirabiles rei operari ex applicatione multa naturalium virutum ad invicem agentium ac patientium; That the testimonies of Theophilus and Polychronus (saith he) may not move any man, it is to be understood that Magick is of two sorts, the one every where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truly or seemingly) by covenants made with devils; the other commended by Origen, which appertaineth to the practick part of natural Philosophy, teaching to work admirable things by the mutual application of natural virtues, agent and suffering reciprocally.

This Partition Hierom doth embrace in the first of his Commentaries upon Daniel, where considering of the difference which Daniel makes between these four kinds of wise Men formerly remembered, he useth this distinction: *Quos non barolos; ceteri autem (id est) incantatores interpetati sunt, videntur mihi esse qui verbis rem peragunt; Magi, qui de singulis philosophantur; Malefici, qui sanguine vivunt, & victimis, & sepe contingunt corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldeis Genethliacis significari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Consecratio autem communis Magos pro maleficiis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem suam, eo quod sint Philosophi Chaldaeorum: & ad artis huius scientiam, Reges quoque Principes ejusdem gentis omnia faciunt; unde & in nativitate domini Salvatoris, ipsi primum ortum ejus intellexerunt, & venientes sanctam Bethlehem, adoraverunt puerum, stella desuper ostendente; They, whom we call Sorcerers, and others interpret Inchanters, seem to me, such as perform things by words; Magicians, such as handle every thing philosophically; Witches, that use blood and sacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldeans, I take them to be signified by the name of Conjurers upon nations, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common custom takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwise reputed in their own Nation: for they* they are the Philosophers of the Chaldeans; yea, King and princes of that Nation do all that they do, according to the knowledge of this Art: whence, at the nativity of the Lord our Saviour, they first of all understood his birth, and coming unto holy Bethlehem, did worship the Child: the Starr from above shewing him unto them. By this therefore it appeareth, that there is great difference between the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers affirm, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex fœdere facta natus diabolici opera ad rem quancunque; That he is called a Magician now-a-days, who having entred league with the Devil, useth his help to any matter: yet (as our Saviour said of Diworce) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magick is of the wisdom of Nature; other Arts which undergo that title, were invented by the fallhood, subtilty, and envie of the Devil. In the latter, there is no other doctrine, than the use of certain ceremonies, Per malam fidem; By an evil faith: in the former, no other ill, than the investigation of those virtues and hidden properties which God hath given to his creatures, and how fitly to apply things that work to things that suffer. And though by the Jews those excellent Magicians, Philosophers, and Divine, which came to worship our Saviour Christ, were teamed Mechaschephim, or, Meccaphsim; yet had they no other reason than common custom therein. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit; Common custom (saith S. Hieron) understandeth Witchcs, under the name of Magicians: And antiquity (saith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) understood good and wise men. Quid igitur expavefcit Magi nomen formidolose, nomen Evangelio gratiosum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, sed sapientem sonat, & sacerdotem? Othon fœ- full one (saith Ficinus) why doubtst thou to use the name of Magus, a name gracious in the Gospel, which doth not signifie a Witch, or a Conjurer, but a wise man, and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that Study and Profession, but only idle Ignorance, the Parent of causeless admiration? Causa fuit mirificentia quorundam operum, quæ (re vera) opera naturalia sunt: veruntamen quia procreatione demonum, naturas ipsas vel conjungentiam, vel commiscitum, vel aliter ad operandum expeditum facta sunt, opera demoni credentur ab ignorantibus hæc. De operibus hujusmodi est Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi impropre vocant. The marvellousness of some works; which (indeed) are natural, but because the cause of this slander: but because these works have been done by procurement of devils, joining the natures together, or mingling them, or howsoever fitting the natures to their working, they were thought the works of the devils by the ignorant. Among these works is natural Magick, which men call very improperly, Necromancy.

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further. For by understanding (saith he) the uttermost activity of natural agents, we are assisted to know the Divinity of Christ: for otherwise (to use his own words) Ignoratis terminis potentie, & virtutis rerum naturalium, stat nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quæ fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia. The terms or limits of natural power and virtue, not understood, we must needs doubt, whether those very works which Christ did, may, not be done, by natural means: alter which he goeth on in this sort: Ideo non hereticus, non superstitionis dixit, sed verissimè & Catholice per istam Magiam adjuvari nos in cognoscenda divinitate Christi. Therefore I said not heretically, not superstitiously, but most truly and Catholically, that by this Magick we are furthered in knowing the Divinity of Christ. And seeing the Jews and others, the enemies of Christian Religion, do impudently and impiously object, that those Miracles which Christ wrought, were not above nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula, a man for his years, fuller of knowledge than any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reason avow, that the uttermost of Nature's works being known, the works which Christ did, and which (as himself witnesseth) no man could do, do manifestly testify of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature herein, but as a Pencil, and by a power infinitely Supreme and Divine; and thereby those that were faithles, were either converted, or put to silence.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to be condemned: though the Devil here, as in other kinds, hath sought to obtrude evil things, under the name and colour of good things.

Seeing therefore it is confessed by all of understanding, that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other than, Divinorum Cultor, & Interpret: A studious Observer and Expounder of Divine things: and the Art of it self (I mean the Art of Natural Magick) no other, Quam naturalis Philosophia absoluta consummata; that the absolute perfection of natural Philosophy: Certainly then it proceeds from ignorance, and no way forth with

with wife and learned men, promiscue, and without difference and distinction, to confound lawfull and praise-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to use S. Pauls words) with those beggerly rudiments, which the Devil hath shuffled, and by them bewitcheth and beseeleth graceles men. For, if we condemn natural Magick, or the wisdom of Nature, because the Devil (who knows more than any man) doth also teach Witches and Poisoners the harmfull parts of Herbs, Drugs, Minerals, and Excrements: then may we, by the same rule, condemn the Physician, and the Art of Healing. For the Devil also in the Oracles of Amphiarau, Amphilocheus, Trophonius, and the like, taught men in Dreams, what Herbs and Drugs were proper for such and such Diseases. Now, no man of judgment is ignorant, that the Devil from the beginning hath sought to thrust himself into the same employment among the Ministers and Servants of God, changing himself for that purpose into an Angel of Light. He hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion; he hath thrust in his Prophets among those of the true God; he hath corrupted the Art of Astrologie, by giving a divine power to the Stars, teaching men to esteem them as gods, and not as instruments. And (as Bunting observeth) it is true, that judicial Astrologie is corrupted with many superstitions: but the abuse of the thing takes not away the Art, considering that heavenly bodies (as even general experience sheweth) have, and exercise their operation upon the inferior. For the Sun and the Starr of Mars do drie; the Moon doth moisten, and govern the Tides of the Sea. Again, the Planets, as they have several and proper names, so have they several and proper virtues: the Stars do also differ in beauty and in magnitude; and to all the Stars hath God given also their proper names, which (had they not influences and virtues different) needed not: He counteth the number of the Stars, and calleth them by their names. But, into the good and profitable knowledge of the celestial influences, the Devil ceaseth not to shuffle in his Superstitions: and so to the knowledge of the secret virtues of Nature hath he fastened his doctrine of Characterr, Numbers, and Incantations; and taught men to believe in the strength of Words and Letters (which, without Faith in God, are but Ink or common breath) thereby either to equal his own with the All-powerfull Word of God, or to diminish the glory of God's creating Word, by whom are all things.

Moreover, he was never ignorant, that both the wise and the simple observe when the Sea-birds forsake the shores, and flie into the Land, that commonly some great storm followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow, betoken fair weather; that the crying of Crows, and bating of Ducks, foretoll Rain: for they feel the air moistened in their quils. And it is written in Hieremy the Prophet, Even the Stork in the air knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemy of Man-kind, working upon these as upon the rest of Gods creatures, long time abused the Heathen, by teaching them to observe the flying of Fowls, and thereby to judge of good or ill success in the Warr: and (withall) to look into their entrails for the same, as if God had written the secrets of unsearchable providence in the Livers and Bowels of Birds and Beasts. Again, because it pleased God sometimes by Dreams, not only to warn and teach his Prophets and Apostles, but Heathen Princes also; as Abimelech to restore Sara to Abraham; because he admonished Joseph, and by a Dream informed Jacob, Laban, Pharaoh, Solomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the East, and others. For as it is remembered in Job: In Dreams and Visions of the night, when I sleep I telleth unto men, &c. Then God openeth the ears; that he might cause man to return from his enterprize; therefore, I say, doth the Devil also practise his Divinations by dreams, or (after Parisensis) divinitatis imitationes, his mock-divinity. This in the end grew to common; as Aristides compiled an Ephemerides of his own Dreams: Mithridates of those of his Concubines. Yea, the Romans, finding the inconvenience hereof, because all Dreams (without distinction of cause) were drawn to Divination, forbade the same by a Law, as by the words of prohibition (aut narrande somniti occultant aliquam artem divinant) it may appear. Likewise by the Law of God, in Deuteronomy, Chap. 13. seducing Dreamers were ordered to be slain. Yet it is to be condemned, not that Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his Dream for two grievous diseases that opprest him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolemeus the poisoned wound; nor that which Saint Augustine reporteth of a Millanese, whose Son (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a Dream, where the Acquittance lay to discharge it: nor that of Astyager of his Daughter; and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, for as much as the cause is not in our selves, this place denieth dispute.

§. IV.

§. IV.

That Daniel's misliking Nebuchodonosor's condemning of the Magicians, doth not justify all their practices.

But it may be objected, that if such Divinations as the Heathens commonly used, were to be condemned in them, who took on them very many and strange Revelations; how came it to pass, that Daniel both condemned the haughty sentence of Nebuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldaea, and in a sort forbade it? especially considering that such kind of people God himself commanded to be slain. To this, divers answers may be given. First, it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldeans, because they acknowledged that the Dream of the King, which himself had forgotten, could not be known to any man by any Art, either Natural or Diabolical: For there is none other (said the Chaldeans) that can declare it before the King, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confessed the power of the Ever-living God.

Secondly, it may be conjectured (and that upon good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any evil or unlawfull Arts, but were merely Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the King commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrary, and called it a hasty judgment, which proceeded with fury without examination. And that some of those mens studies and professions were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniel's instruction: for himself had been taught by them; and was called chief of the Incantations: of which some were termed South-fayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldeans, others Magi, or Wise-men: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel misliked and forbade the execution of that judgment, because it was unjust. For howsoever those men might deserve punishment for the practice of unlawfull Arts (though not unlawfull according to the law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltless. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the King's thought, which the Devil himself could not know. So then, in Daniel's dislike, and hindring of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute justifying of their practice and profession.

§. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemn the right use of them.

Notwithstanding this mixture every where, of good with evil, of fallshood with truth, of corruption with cleanness and purity: The good, The truth, The purity in every kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbore to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Devil, in the Image of Baal, Asaroth, Chemoth, Jupiter, Apollo, and the like, was so adored.

Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may believe the most ancient and religious Historians) from observing the motions and natures of heavenly bodies; neither can it dehort wise and learned men in these days from attributing those virtues, influences, and inclinations to the Stars and other lights of Heaven, which God hath given to those his glorious creatures.

The Sympathetical, and Antipathetical working of Herbs, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other utmost virtues, sometimes taught by the Devil, and applied by his Ministers to harmful and uncharitable ends, can never terrifie the honest and learned Physician or Magician from the using of them to the help and comfort of Man-kind: neither can the illusions, whereby the Devil betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reject the observations of Dreams; so far as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make use of them.

Lastly, the prohibition to mark flying of Fowls (as signs of good or evil success) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crows against Rain, or to any observation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be given. For if we confound Arts with the abuse of them, we shall not only condemn all honest Trades and enterchange amongst men (for there are that deceive in all Professions) but we shall in a short time bury in forgetfulness all excellent knowledge and all learning; or obscure and cover it over with a most scornfull and beggarly ignorance: and (as Pliny teacheth) we should shew our selves, Ingratos erga eos, qui labore curaque lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce: Unthankfull towards those, who with pains and care have discovered unto us light in this light.

Indeed, not only these natural knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant; but the Mathematick also, and Professors thereof: though those that are excellently learned learned, judge of it in this sort: In speculo Mathematico verum illud, quod in omni scibili queritur, elucet; non modo remota similitudine, sed fulgida quadam propinquitate: In the Glass of the Mathematick, that Truth doth shine, which is sought in every kind of knowledge; not in an obscuring, but in a neer and manifest representation.

§. VI.

Of the divers kinds of unlawfull Magick.

It is true, that there are many Arts, if we may so call them, which are covered with the name Magick: and esteemed abusively to be as branches of that Tree, on whose root they never grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancy, or Goetia: and of this again there are divers kinds. The one is an Invocation at the Graves of the dead, to whom the Devil himself gives answer in stead of those that seem to appear. For certain it is, that the immortal souls of men do not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they give motion and understanding to the living: death being nothing else but a separation of the body and soul: and therefore the soul is not to be found in the Graves.

A second practice of those men, who pay Tribute, or are in league with Satan, is that of conjuring, or raising up Devils, of whom they hope to learn what they list. These men are so distracted, as they believe, that by terrible words they make the Devil to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keep out a Mouse) they therein (as they suppose) inforce themselves against that great Monster. Doubtless, they forget that the Devil is not terrified from doing ill, and all that is contrary to God and goodness, no, not by the fearful Word of the Almighty: and that he feared not to offer to sit in Gods seat, that he made no scruple to tempt our Saviour Christ, whom himself called the Son of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of his, an unworthy wretch, will yet resolve himself, that he can draw the Devil out of Hell, and terrifie with a Phrase: whereas in very truth, the obedience which the Devils seem to use, is but thereby to possess themselves of the bodies and souls of those which raise them up; as His Majesty in his Book aforementioned hath excellently taught: That the Devils obedience is only, secundum quid, scilicet ex pacto; respectu, that is, upon bargain.

I cannot tell what they can do upon those simple and ignorant Devils, which inhabit Lamblike imagination; but sure I am, the rest are apt enough to come uncalled: and always attending the cogitations of their servants and vassals, do no way need any such inforcement.

Or, it may be that these Conjurers dealt altogether with Cardani mortal Devils, following the opinion of Rabbi Avornathan and of Porphyrius, who taught that these kind of Devils lived not above a thousand years: which Plutarch in his Treatise of Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great God Pan. For, were it true, that the Devils were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they always fear those words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly mastered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus, when he had lifted him up in the air, cast him headlong out of his claws, when he was sure he should perish with the fall. If this, perhaps, were done by S. Peter's Prayers (Of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the same pranks at other times, upon his own accord, the Devil played with Theodorus; who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to have been) had the same mortal fall that he had. The like success had Eudæ, a principal Pillar of the Manichean Heresie, as Socrates in his Ecclesiastical History witnesseth: and for a manifest proof hereof, we see it every day, that the Devil leaves all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallows, for whom at other times he maketh himself a Pegasse, to convey them in haste to places far distant, or at least makes them so thick: For those that received not the truth (saith S. Paul) God shall send them strong illusions: Of these their supposed transportations (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Majesty in the 2^d Book, & the 4th Chap. of the Demonologie, hath confirmed by unanswerable reasons, that they are merely illusive. Another sort there are, who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses & Crystals; of whom Chrysostom: Falsi sunt Incantatores, qui in ungues & vitro volunt spiritum includere, quia Spiritus non clauduntur corpore: They are foolish Incanters, which will shut up their spirits within their nails, or in Glass: for a spirit cannot be inclosed by a body.

There is also another art besides the aforementioned, which they call Theurgia, or White Magick; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Invocation they draw out of Heaven and communicate withall. But the administering Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due unto their Creator; so, seeing they are most free Spirits, there is no man so absurd to think (except the Devil have corrupted his understanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heaven by by threats. Wherefore let the Professours thereof cover themselves how they please by a professed purity of life, by the ministry of Infants, by fasting and abstinence in general; yet all those that tamper with immaterial substances, and abstract natures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or Inforcement, or men of evil faith, and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Devils, which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked Divinations; as by fire, called Pyromantia; by water, called Hydromantia; by the air, called Atteotechnia, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other, is Enchantment or Witchcraft: the Practicers whereof are no less envious and cruel, revengeful and bloody, than the Devil himself. And these accursed creatures, having sold their souls to the Devil, work two ways; either by the Devil immediately, or by the Art of poisoning. The difference between Necromancers and Witches, His Majesty hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a fort) command; the other obey the Devil.

There is another kind of petty Witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falconry, yet was it no more to be admired than Mahomet's Dove, which he had used to feed with Wheat out of his ear: which Dove, when it was hungry, lighted on Mahomet's shoulder, and thrust his Bill therein to find his breakfast: Mahomet persuading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghost that gave him advice. And certainly, if Banck had lived in elder times, he would have shamed all the Inchanters of the World: for whosoever was most famous among them, could never master or instruct any Beast as he did his Horse.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by Inchantments (which the Marsians, a people of Italy, practised: Colubros diffrauit Marsia cantu: inchanting Marfia makes the Snakes to burst). That it hath been used, it appears, Psalm 58. 6. though I doubt not, but that many Impostures may be in this kind, and even by natural causes it may be done. For, there are many fumes that will either draw them out, or destroy them; as womens hair burnt, and the like. So many things may be laid in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I find no other Magick or Inchantments than to draw out a Mouse with a piece of tosted Cheese.

Of divers ways by which the Devil seemeth to work his wonders.

BUT to the end that we may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of gods: that we do not give to the Devil any other dominion than he hath (not speak of his ability, when he is the Minister of Gods vengeance; as when Egypt, according to David, was destroyed by evil Angels) he otherwise worketh but three ways. The first is, by moving the cogitation and affections of men: The second, by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And, that they cannot work what they would, G. Parisiensis giveth three causes: the first, a natural impotency: the second, their own reason disswading them from daring overmuch, or indeed (and that which is the onely certain cause) the great mercy of the Creator. Tenens, Sicut eos ligatas (saith the same Author) velut in manifestissimas belluas. S. Augustine was of opinion, that the Frogs which Pharaoh's Sorcerers produced, were not natural, but that the Devil (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appear to be such. For, as Varinus observeth, those Frogs of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeed. Hereof, saith Saint Augustine: *Nec sancti Demonum naturas creant, sed quæ à Deo create sunt mutant, ut videantur esse quod non sunt: The Devils create not any creatures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seem to be that which they be not: of which in the 82. Question he giveth the reason. Demon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes meatus intelligentie, per quos aperire lumen rationis radium mentis silet (that is) The Devil fills with certain clouds all passages of the understanding, by which the beam of the truth mind is wont to open the light of reason.*

And, as Tertullian in his Book de Anima rightly conceiveth, if the Devil can possess himself of the eyes of our minds, and blind them, it is not hard for him to daze those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Devil entrench in, beginning with the fantasie, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soul: for the fantasie is most apt to be abused by vain apprehensions.

Aquinas on the contrary, held, that those Frogs were not imaginary, but such indeed as they seemed: not made Magice artis Indubria, which indeed agreeeth not with the Art, but (according to Thomas) Per aptam & idoneam

neam agentium & patientium applicationem: By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceived by that sleight of false semblance, and S. Augustine in another case like unto this (to wit) of the turning of Diomedes his companions into Birds, per adspicuum passivum, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perfwaded that S. Augustine doth believe that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis, a man very learned also, confirmeth. For, speaking of natural Magick, he useth these words: De hisjussu autem operibus, & subita generatio ranarum, & pediculorum, & verminum, aliorumque animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verum adhibitis adiutoribus ipsa seminatur natura confortant, & account, ita ut opus generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus natura videatur (quæ tardius talia efficere consuevit) sed potentia Demonum &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in his docti sunt, talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in his glorificant: In such works (saith he) the sudden generation of Frogs and Lice, and Worms, and some other creatures: in all which, Nature alone worketh; but by means strengthening the seeds of Nature, and quickning them; in such wise, that they so hasten the work of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant, not to be the work of Nature, which usually worketh more leisurely, but they think it done by the powers of Devils. But they who are learned in these Arts, marvel not at such working, but glorify the Creator. Now, by these two ways the Devils do most frequently work (to wit) by knowing the uttermost of nature, and by illusion: for there is no incomprehensible or unsearchable power, but of God onely.

For, shall we say, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, & tempests; and can infect the air, as well as move it or compress it; who knows not that these things are also natural? Or, may it be objected that he foretelleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion. It is true, that he sometimes doth it; but how? In elder Ages he stole his knowledge out of the Predictions of the Prophets: and foretold the death of Saul, at such time as he was in his own possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath lived from the infancy of the world to this day, and observed the success of every counsel: he that by reason of his swift motions can inform himself of all places, and preparations: he that is of counsel with all those that study and practise subversion and destruction: he that is Prince of the air, and can thence better judge, than those that inhabit the earth: if he should not sometimes, yea, if he should not very oftentimes ghes rightly of things to come (where God pleaseeth not to give impediment) it were very strange. For we see, that while they learned men do oftentimes by comparing like causes, conceive rightly of like effects before they happen: and yet, where the Devil doubteth, and would willingly keep his credit, he evermore answereth by Riddles: as

If Cresus over Halys go,
Great Kingdoms he shall overthrow.

Which answer may be taken either way: either for the overthrow of his own Kingdom, or of his Enemies. And thus far we grant the Devil may proceed in Predictions, which otherwise belong to God only, as it is in Ezay: Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are Gods; shew us at all times, and certainly what is to come. Solutio enim divine intelligentie est, oculis nolle & revelare: It is onely proper to God; understanding and wisdom to know and reveal hidden things.

S. VIII.

That none was ever raised from the dead by the power of the Devil: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

TO conclude, It may be objected, that the Devil hath raised from the dead: and that others by his power have done the like, as in the example given of Samuel, raised by the Witch of Endor; which, were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed, that some of the Devil's acts exceeded all the powers of Nature, false semblance, and other illusions. Justin Martyr was sometime of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeed; and so was Ambrose, Lyra, and Burgenfis; from which Authorities those men borrow strength which so believe. But Martyr changed his opinion; and so did S. Augustine, who at first seemed to be indifferent: For, in his Questions upon the Old and New Testament, he accounteth it detestable to think it was Samuel which appeared; and these be his words elsewhere to the same effect: In requie sunt anime piornum a corpore separate, impiorum autem penas lunt, donec istarum ad vitam eternam, istarum vero ad eternam mortem que secunda dicitur, corpora reviviscant: The souls of the godly separated from their bodies, are at rest, but those of the wicked, suffer punishment, till the bodies of the just rise to eternal life, and of the wicked to an eternal and second death.

And

And (besides S. Augustine) Justin Martyr, Helarius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostom, and others, believed firmly, and taught it: that the souls of men, being once separate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all: Credere debemus (saith Cyril) quoniam de corporibus sanctorum anime abierint, tanquam in manus charissimi patris bonitati divina commendari; We must believe, when the souls of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be committed to the divine Goodness, as into the hands of a most dear Father. If then they be in Heaven, the power of the Devil cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, Ab inferno nulla est redemptio; From Hell there is no redemption. For, there are but two habitations after death: Unum (saith Augustine) in igne eterno; alterum in regno eterno; The one in eternal fire; the other in Gods eternal Kingdom. And though it be written in Jure Pontificio, that many there are who believe, that the dead have again appeared to the living; yet the Gloss upon the same Text finds it ridiculous: Credunt, & male, quia sunt Phantasmata (saith the Gloss) They believe, and they believe amiss, because they be but Phantasmes, or apparitions. For, whereas any such voice hath been heard, saying, I am the Soul of such a one: Hec oratio à fraude atque deceptione diabolica est; That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Devil, saith Chrysostom. Likewise of the same, saith Tertullian: Assit ut animam cuiuslibet sancti, necnon Prophetæ, à demonio credamus extrahi; God forbid that we should think that the Soul of any holy man, much less of a Prophet, should be drawn up again by a Devil.

It is true, that the Scriptures call that apparition, Samuel; so do they the wooden Images, Cherubims; and false brazen gods are gods, and the like. And whereas these of the contrary opinion build upon that place of the 26. of Ecclesiasticus (a Book not numbered among the Canonical Scriptures, as S. Augustine himself in this Treatise, if it be his, De cura pro mortuis agenda, confesseth) yet Syracides, following the literal sense and phrase of the Scriptures, proveth nothing at all: For, though the Devil would willingly persuade, that the souls (yea, even of just men) were in his power; yet so far is it from the promises of the Scriptures, and from Gods just and merciful nature, and so contrary to all divine reason, as S. Augustine (or whosoever wrote that Book before cited) might rightly term it a detestable opinion so to think. For, if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that he refused to answer him; either by Dreams, by Visions, or by his Prophets: it were foolish to conceive, that he would permit the Devil, or a wicked Witch, to raise a Prophet from the dead in Saul's respect; it being also contrary to his divine Law, to ask counsel of the dead: as in Deut. 18. and elsewhere. Therefore it was the Devil, and not the Soul of a dead body, that gave answer and advice.

But because Helias and Helixius had raised some from the dead by the power of God; those Devils which Saint Augustine calleth Ludificatores animantium sibi subditorum; Mockers of their own vassals, casting before their eyes a semblance of humane bodies, and framing sounds to their ears, like the voices of men; do also perswade their graceless and accursed attendants, that themselves both possess, and have power over, the souls of men. Eludit Diabolus aciem tuam spectantium, tum etiam cogitantium, saith L. Vives; The Devil beguileth the sense both of the beholders, and of those that so imagine. These then are the bounds of the Devil's power, whom, if we will not fear, we must fear to sin. For, when he is not the instrument of God's vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himself his voluntary vassal: Potest ad malum invitare, non potest trahere, saith S. Augustine; He can allure, but he cannot enforce to evil. Such as think otherwise, may go into the number remembered by Lucretius:

In tenebris metunt: sic nos in luce timemus.*

We fear by light, as children in the dark.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus, and of his Wife Semiramis, and of other her Acts.

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Ninive by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus; and the beginning of Semiramis Reign.

But to come back to Ninus, the amplifier and finisher of Ninive: whether he performed it before or after the overthrow of Zoroaster, it is uncertain. As for the City it self, it is agreed by all profane Writers, and by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and answerable magnificence. For it had in compass 440. stadia, or furlongs; the walls whereof were an hundred foot upright; and had such a breadth, as three Chariots might pass on the Rampire in front: these walls were garnished with 1500. Towers, which gave exceeding beauty to the rest, and strength, no less admirable for the nature of those times.

But this City (built in the Plains of Affria, and on the banks of Tygris, and in the region of Edeh) was founded long before Ninus time; and (as ancient Historians report, and more lately Nauclerus) had the name of Campfor; at such time as Ninus amplified the same, and gave it a wall, and called it after his own name.

For these works of Babylon and Ninive begun by Ninrod in Chaldea, and in Affria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finished Ninive, Semiramis Babylon; wherein she sought to exceed her husband by far. Indeed in the first Age, when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to invade others, nor feared to be invaded; labouring to build Towns and Villages, for the use of themselves and their people, without either Walls or Towers; and how they might discharge the earth of Woods, Briars, Bushments, and Waters, to make it more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis living in that Age, when Ambition was strong in youth; and purposing to follow the Conquest which her husband had undertaken, gave that beauty and strength to Babylon which it had.

This she did after the death of her husband Ninus; who, after he had mastered Babylonia, and subjected unto his Empire all those Regions between it and the Mediterranean Sea and Hellepont (Asia the less excepted) and finished the work of Ninive; he left the world in the year thereof 2019. after he had reigned 25. years. Plutarch reporteth; that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would grant unto her the absolute sovereign power for one day. Diod. Siculus, out of Athenæus; and others, speak of five days. In which time (moved either with desire of Rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her husband to be slain. But this seemeth rather a scandal cast on her by the Greeks, than that it had any truth.

Howsoever Ninus came to his end, Semiramis took on her, after his death, the sole Rule of the Affrian Empire: of which Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because he changed his seat from Babylon in Chaldea, to Ninive in Affria. Justin reports, that Semiramis (the better to invest her self, and in her beginning without murmur or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented her self to the people in person of her Son Ninus, or Zameir, who bare her external form and proportion without any sensible difference.

This report I take also to be feigned, for which many arguments might be made. But as she ruled long, so she performed all those memorable Acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that Letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and undertaken conquest) by her own name. And were it true that her Son Ninus had had a stature at his fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was) very perfonable) could be taken for him; yet it is very unlikely that the could have held the Empire from him 42. years after by any fuch fubility (for fo long he reigned after the death of her husband;) but it may be true, that Ninias, or Zameis (being wholly given to his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleafed with his mothers prosperous government and undertakings.

§. III.

Of Semiramis Parentage and Education, and Metamorphofis of her Mother.

SOME Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to have been of bafe Parentage, calling her after the name of her Country a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her City wherein she was born, Semiramis Afalonitis, of Afalon, the antient City and Metropolis of the Philistims. Others report her to be the Daughter of Derceta, a Curtizan of Afalon, exceeding beautiful. Others fay, that this Derceta or Dercetis, the mother of Semiramis, was fometimes a Reclufe, and had profest a holy and a religious life; to whom there was a Temple dedicated, feated on the bank of a Lake adjoining to Afalon; and afterward falling in love with a goodly young man, she was by him made with child, which (for fear of extreme punishment) she conveyed away, and caufed the fame to be hidden among the high Reeds which grew on the banks of the Lake: in which (while the child was left to the mercy of wilde Beasts) the fame was fed by certain Birds, which ufed to feed upon, or near thofe Waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For, fome one or other adjoining to this Lake, had the charge and fosteridge of this child, who being per chance but fome bafe and obfcure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to cover her difhonour and breach of Vow; notwithstanding which, she was caft from the top of her Temple into the Lake adjoining, and (as the Poets have feigned) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her face, which ftill held the fame beauty and humane fhape. It is thought, that from this Derceta, the invention of that Idol of the Philistims (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a Mans face, and a Fishes body; into whose Temple when the Ark of God was brought, the Idol fell twice to the ground: and at the fecond fall there remained only the trunk of Dagon, the head being broken off: For fo S. Hierom hath converted that place, Vat-

blus, Pagninus, and Junius, write it by Dagon onely, which fignifieth a Fish, and fo it onely appeared: the head thereof by the fecond fall being fundered from the body.

For my felf, I rather think, that this Dagon of the Philistims, was an Idol representing Triton, one of thofe imaginary Sea-gods under Neptune. For this City being maritime (as all thofe of the Philistims were, and fo were the beft of Phenicia) ufed all their devotions to Neptune, and the reft of the petty gods which attended him.

§. I V.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after diffigure: with a note of the improbability of her vices.

BUT for her Pedigree, I leave it to Affyrian Heralds; and for her vicious life, I alcribe the report thereof to the envious and lying Grecians. For delicacy & ease do more often accompany licentiousness in men and women, than labour and hazzard do. And if the one half be true which is reported of this Lady, then there never lived any Prince or Princefs more worthy of Fame than Semiramis was, both for the works she did at Babylon, and elsewhere, and for the Wars she made with glorious fucces: all but her laft enterprife of India, from whence both Strabo and Arianus report, that the never returned; and that of all her most powerfull Army, there furvived but onely twenty perfons; the reft, being either drowned in the River of Indus, dead of the Famine, or slain by the Sword of Staurobates. But, as the multitude which went out are more than reason hath numbered; fo were thofe that returned, lefs than could have efaped of fuch an Army, as confifted of four Millions and upwards. For thefe numbers, which the levied by her Lieutenant Dercetæus (faith Suidas) did confift of Foot-men three Millions; of Horfe-men one Million; of Chariots, armed with hooks on each fide, one hundred thoufand; of thofe which fought upon Camels as many; of Camels for burthen, two hundred thoufand; of raw Hides for all ufs, three hundred thoufand; of Gallies with brazen heads, three thoufand, by which the might tranfport over Indus at once, three hundred thoufand fouldiers: which Gallies were furnifhed with Syrians, Phenicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. The incredible and imposable numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourifh (had every Man and Beast but fed on grafs) are taken from the Authority rity of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: fo Diodorus himfelf hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes Expedition into Greece and afterwards; whole Army (though the fame was farr inferior to that of Semiramis) yet it had weight enough to over-load the belief of any reasonable man. For all Authours confent, that Xerxes tranfported into Greece, an army of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to pafs the Hellefpont) three thoufand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the feveral Provinces whence thofe Gallies were taken, hath collected the number.

But of what multitude fover the Army of Semiramis confifted, the fame being broken, and overthrow by Staurobates, upon the banks of Indus; Canticum cantavit extremum; Shejang her laft fong; and (as Antiquity hath feigned) was changed by the gods into a Dove (the Bird of Venus) whence it came, that the Babylonians gave a Dove in their Enfigns.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus built by Semiramis; and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

AMONG all her other memorable and more than magnificent works (befides the wall of the City of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this City, invironed with a wall carried four fquare of great height and beauty, having on each fquare, certain brazen Gates curiously engraven. In the Core of the fquare, the raifed a Tower of a furlong high, which is half a quarter of a mile; and upon it again (taking a Basis of a lefs circuit) she fet a fecond Tower; and feight in all, one above another, upon the top whereof the Chaldean Priests made the Obfervation of the Stars; becaufe this Tower over-topped the ordinary clouds.

By beholding the ruines of this Tower, have many Travellers been deceived; who fuppofe that they have feen a part of Nimrod's Tower, when it was but the foundation of this Temple of Bel (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod). There were burnt in this Temple, one hundred thoufand talents of Frankincenfe every year (faith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nehuchodonofor adorn with the fpoils of Hierufalem, and of the Temple of Solomon: all which vefels and ornaments Cyrus redelivered. This Temple Xerxes evned with the foil; which Alexander is faid to have repaired, by the perfuafions of the Chaldeans; I deny not that it might have been in his defire fo to do; but he enjoyed but a few years after Babylon taken, and therefore could not perform any fuch work. The Egyptians (faith Proclus) inhabiting a low and level ground, and given to the fame fuperftition of the Stars that the Chaldeans were, erected in imitation, and for the fame fervice and ufe, the Pyramides by Memphis, which were confpicua undique navigantibus, faith Pliny. Of thefe Pyramides, Bellonius, a carefull obferver of Rarities (who being in Egypt, mounted by fteps to the top of the higheft) maketh this report: Le meilleur archer qui feroit à fa fommeite, & tirant une fleche in l'air, a peine pourroit l'envoyer hors de fa bafe q'elle ne fe tombaft fur les degrez; The beft Archer ftanding on the top of one of thefe Pyramides, and fhooting an arrow from thence into the air, as farr as he can, with great difficulty fhall be able fo to force the fame, but that it will fall upon fome of the degrees of fteps.

CHAP. I.

Of the Time of the Birth of Abraham: and the use of this Question, for the ordering of the Story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of some of the Successors of Semiramis: with a brief transition to the Question, about the time of the Birth of Abraham.

After the death of Semiramis, Ninus, or Zamek, succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berossus Annianus bestows the conquest of Bactria, and the overthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diadorus, Justine, Orosius, and all other approved Writers. For Ninus being esteemed no man of Warr at all, but altogether feminine, and subjected to ease and delicacy, there is no probability in that opinion. Now, because there was nothing performed by this Ninus of any moment, other than that out of jealousy he every year changed his Provincial Governours, and built Colleges for the Chaldean Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Arius his successour, whom Suidas calleth Thuras; but that he reduced again the Bactrians and Cassians, revolted (as it seemeth) in Ninus his time: nor of Arlunus, the successour of Arius; but that he added sumptuousity, invented Jewels of Gold and Stone, and some Engines for the Warr: I will, for this present, pass them over, and while follow Abraham, whose ways are warrantable (till we meet these Assyrians again in this Story) by whom, and by whose issues, we shall best give date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham living at once with Ninus, Ninias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralus, and Xerxes, or Balanus. For, otherwise, if we seek to prove things certain by the uncertain, and judge of those times, which the Scriptures set us down without error, by the reigns of the Assyrian Princes; we shall but patch up the Story at adventure, and leave it in the same confusion, in which, to this day, it hath remained. For, where the Scriptures do not help us, Mirum non est in rebus antiquis, Historiam non constare; No marvel if then in things very ancient, History is without assurance.

The better therefore to find out, in what Age of the World, and how long, these Assyrian Kings reigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abraham's bedham's Birth, and in what year the same happened after the Flood. Now, since all agree that the three and fourtieth year of Ninus, was the birth-year of Abraham; by proving directly, out of the Scriptures, in what year after the Flood, the birth of Abraham happened, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much jangling between those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others; the most part making 292, or 293 years; others 352 years between Abraham's Birth and the Flood: a matter often disputed, but never concluded.

Archidamus de symonibus (as we find him in Anacrus) makes but 150 years from the Flood to Ninus: then seeing that Abraham was born in the three and fourtieth year of Ninus, according to Eusebium and Saint Augustine, it followeth, by the addition of those two numbers, that the year of Abraham's Birth, was in the year after the Flood, 292, or, as the most part of all Chronologers gather, the year 292.

Now, since I do here enter into that never resolved Question, and Labyrinth of times, it behoveth me to give Reason for my own Opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walk aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, and without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those darts, which Envy casteth at Novelty, than go on safely and sleepily in the easy ways of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diversity.

§. II.

A Proposal of Reasons or Arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the year 292. after the Flood, and not in year 352.

Those who seek to prove this account of 292 years, between the general Flood and Abraham's Birth, ground themselves; first, on these words of the Scripture: So Terah lived 70 years, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: Secondly, upon the Opinion of Josephus, Saint Augustine, Eusebius, and many of the ancient Hebrews before them: Authorities (while they are slightly looked over) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembered, the later Chronologers gather their arguments. First, out of the words as they lie; That Terah, at 70 years begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the Son of the Promise, ought in this respect to be counted the eldest Son of Terah, and so necessarily born in the seventieth year of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heir of the Blessing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter, was to set down the Genealogie of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest Son, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtful. For it cannot then be proved; that Abraham was born more assuredly in the 130. year of Terah his age, than in the 131, 132, &c. Moses having no where set down precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very year, in which his father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begat Abraham at 130 years: seeing Abraham himself thought it a wonder to be made a father at 100 years.

§. III.

The Answer to the Objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one Journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan; and it, after his fathers death.

To answer all which Objections, it is very easy, the way being prepared thereby by divers learned Divines long since, and to which I will adde somewhat of mine own, according to the small talent which God hath given me. Now, for as much as the state of the Question cannot well be scanned, unless the time of Abraham's journey into Canaan be first considered off, before I descend unto the particular examination of these Arguments, I will make bold with order and method so far, as to search into a strange tradition concerning his travels, that serveth as a ground for this Opinion, and a bulwark against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceived, that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan: the later after his fathers death, the former presently upon his calling; which he performed without delay, not staying for his fathers death at Haran: a conjecture drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where it is written,

Heb. 11. 8. By faith Abraham (when he was called) obeyed God, to go out into a place which he should afterward receive for inheritance: and he went out, not knowing whither he went. This Supposition (if it be granted) serves very well to uphold the opinion that can ill stand without it. Let us therefore see whether we may give credit to the Supposition it self.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charan, or Haran, after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proved, without the admission of any distinction, by the words of Saint Stephen: And after his father was dead, God brought him into this land, where he now dwells; that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place, so direct and plain, what force hath any mans fancy or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan; one before Terah's death, and another after: no such thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability or reason to induce it? For, if any man out of this place before alleged can pick any argument, proving, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned unto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I think it reason, that he be believed in the rest. But, that he performed the Commandment of God after his Fathers death, leaving Ur & Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his Father was dead (saith Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double journey into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembered the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For, if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Jews, his adversaries, too great an occasion both of scandalizing himself and the Gospel of Christ. Indeed, we shall find small reason to make us think, that Abraham passed and re-passed those ways, more often than he was enforced so to do, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comfort in this long and wearisome journey, than the strength of his faith in Gods promises: In which, if any thing would have brought him to despair, he had more cause than ever man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborn Nations: a Nation of valiant and resolute Idolaters. He was beset with famine at his first arrival, and driven to flee into Egypt for relief. His wife was old, and he had no Son to inherit the Promise, And when God had given him Isaac, he commended him to offer him up to himself for sacrifices, all which discomforts he patiently and constantly underwent.

Secondly, let us consider the ways themselves, which Abraham had to pass over; the length whereof was 300. English miles; and through Countreys of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himself over the great River of Euphrates, to travel through the dangerous & barren Deserts of Palmyrena, and to climb over the great and high mountains of Libanus, Hermon, or Gilead: and whether these were easie walks for Abraham to march twice over, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let every reasonable man judge: For, if he travelled it twice; then was his journey in all, 1800. miles from Ur to Haran; and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove this fancy; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more proof (that he had not attinens reverendi; not any thought of looking backward) than any mans bare conjecture, be he of what antiquity or authority soever. For thus it is written of him, Then Abraham took Sara his wife, and Lot his brothers Son, and all their substance that they possessed, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, and to the land of Canaan they came. Now, if Abraham brought all with him that was dear unto him; his wife and kinsmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walk it back again for his pleasure, in so warm, dangerous, and barren a Countrey as that was: or, if he could have been there moved, it is more likely, that he would have then returned, when he was yet unsettled, and prest with extreme famine at his first arrival. For had his father been then alive, he might have hoped from him to receive more assured comfort and relief, than among the Egyptians, to whom he was a meer stranger, both in Religion and Nation.

What the cause might be of Abrahams return to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures have sent him back thither, about the time of his fathers death: so they, perhaps, if they were urged, could say little else, than that without such a second voyage, their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plain, if it be not over-troublesome. They say, that Abraham was in Haran at his fathers death, or some time after, being then, by their account, 135. years old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite undone the business, which, as we read, was within four four or five years after that time, his greatest, or (as may seem) his only care? Did not he bind with a very solemn oath, his principal servant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to travel into those parts, and seek out a Wife for Isaac his Son? and doth it not appear by all circumstances, that neither he nor his servant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, that they could particularly design any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely, if Abraham had been there in person so lately, as within four or five years before, he would not have forgotten a matter of such importance; but would have trusted his own judgment, in choosing a woman, fit for her piety, virtue, and other desirable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his only Son, who was then five and thirty years old; before which age, most of the Patriarchs after the Flood had begotten children; rather than have left all at random to the consideration of a servant, that neither knew any, nor was known of any, in that Countrey. But, let it be supposed (if it may be believed) that either Abraham forgot his business when he was there, or that somewhat happened, which no man can devise; What might be the reason, that Abrahams man, in doing his Masters errand, was fain to lay open the whole Story of his Masters prosperity, telling it as news, that Sarah had born to him a Son in her old age? If Abraham himself a more certain Author, had so lately been among them, would not all this have been an idle tale? It were needless to stand long upon a thing so evident. Whether it were lawful for Abraham to have returned back to Haran, would, perhaps, be a question hardly answerable; considering how averse he was from permitting his son to be carried thither, even though a Wife of his own kinsred could not have been obtained without his personal presence. Jacob indeed was sent thither by his Parents, to take a Wife of his own lineage; not without Gods especial approbation, by whose blessing he prospered in that journey; yet he lived there as a servant, suffered many injuries; and finally, was driven to convey himself from thence by flight. For although it be not a sentence written, yet out of all written Examples it may be observed, that God alloweth not in his servants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken, and transplanted them. That brief saying, Remember Lot's Wife, contains much matter. Let us consider Mesopotamia, from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole Nation of the Israelites were delivered: we shall find, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the Posterity of the Hebrews. When Hezekias was visited with an honourable Embassie from Babel, it seems that he conceived great pleasure in his mind, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the Prophecy which thereupon he heard by Esay, made him to know, that the counsel of God was not agreeable to such thoughts; which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when by the Waters of Babylon they sat down and wept. Concerning Egypt we read, that Sefac and Neco, Kings of Egypt, brought calamity upon Israel: also that their confidence in the Egyptian succours, was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to return into Egypt, I do not remember, nor can readily find; but it is found in Deuteronomy, that God had said, They should no more return that way; which is given, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to return to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Horses. Whether the Lord had laid any such injunction upon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things do argue it probably: That he never returned, all circumstances do (to my understanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But, because this double passage of Abrahams is but an imagination, and that Imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can perswade those of judgment or understanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught us, that Abraham left Haran, his father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to prove it, I will believe as they do. For all the travels of Abraham are precisely set down in the Scriptures: as first from Ur, or Camerina in Chaldaea to Haran, or Charan; and then from Haran (after his fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem he removed to a mountain between Bethel and Haze: thence into Egypt; from Egypt he returned thither again, where Lot and he parted, because their flocks and herds of Cattel were more then could be fed in that part: from thence the second time he removed to Mamre, near Hebron; and thence, having pursued Amraphel, and rescued Lot, he after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumea under Abimelec: and after, near unto it at Bersabe, at which time he was ready to offer up his Son Isaac on the mountain Moriah. But this fiction of his retreat to Haran, or Charan, appeareth not in any one Story, either divine or humane. Now, if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former journey into Canaan, as Levitis his Cabala hath feined, it should in reason be therewithall be believed, that he would in those his first first travels have provided himself of some certain seat, or place of abiding; and not have come a second time with his Wife, kinsmen, family, goods, and Cattel, not knowing whereon to rest himself. But Abraham, when he came from Charran, passed through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the plain of Moriah; where, finding no place to inhabit, he departed thence to Bethel, and Hai; and so from Nation to Nation, to discover and find out some fit habitation: from whence again, as it is written in Genesis the eleventh, He went forth, going and journeying towards the South; and always unsettled. By reason of which wandering to and fro, some say, the Egyptians gave him and his the name of Hebrai.

Further, to prove that he had not formerly been in the Country, we may note, that ere he came into Bethel and Hai, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God, appeared unto him, saying, Unto thy seed will I give this Land, shewing it him, as unto a stranger therein, and as a Land to him unknown. For, Abraham, without any other provident care for himself, believed in the Word of the living God: neither sending before, nor coming first to discover it; but being arrived, he received a second Promise from God, that he would give those Countries unto him and his seed to inhabit and inherit.

Lastly, what should move any man to think, that Moses would have omitted any such double journey of Abraham's, seeing he set forth down all his passages, elsewhere, long and short? as when he moved, from Sichem, and seated between Hai and Bethel, the distance being but 20 miles: and when he moved thence to the Valley of Mamre, being but 24 miles; and when he left Mamre, and sat down at Gerar, being less than six miles; No, Moses past over all the times of the first Age with the greater brevity, to hasten him to the Story of Abraham: shutting up all between the Creation and the Flood in six Chapters; which Age lasted 1656 years; but he belitteth on the Story of Abraham, fourteen Chapters, beginning with his Birth in the eleventh, and ending with his Death in the five & twentieth; and this time endured but 175 years. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abraham's travels, or other actions: or that he would set down those small removes of five miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a journey in going and coming would have ministered some variety of matter, or accident, worthy the inserting and adding to Abraham's Story.

§. I.V.

The Answer to another of the Objections proposed, shewing, that it was not unlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year.

NOW, touching the Objection, where it is said, that it was very unlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year, seeing Abraham himself thought; it a wonder to have a Son at an hundred; this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeed mis-cast; and mis-taken: Abraham having respect only to Sarah his Wife, when he spake of their many years. For, when the Angel said unto Abraham in his Tent door at Mamre; Loe, Sarah thy Wife shall have a Son, it followeth in the next Verse, Now, Abraham and Sarah were old; and stricken in age, and it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then, in that it is said, it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second wife Keturah, had many Sons after Sarah's death, as Zimron, Jockhan, Medan, Isbak, and Shuah; and the eldest of these was born 37 years after Isaac; and the youngest 40 years after. What strangeness then, that Terah, being 130 years old, should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed despair of Abraham at 100 years? For Sarah died in the year of the world 2145, and Isaac was born in the year 2109, and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109, out of 2145, there remaineth 36: And therefore if Abraham begat 5 sons 36 years after this supposed wonder, and when Abraham was 137 years old; it is not strange, that his father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Boaz, Obed, and Jesse, who lived to many years and Ages after Abraham, begat Sons at 100 years, or near it, it cannot be marvelled at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130, and Abraham others at the same age, and seven years after.

§. V.

The Answer to two more of the Objections: shewing that we may have certainty of Abraham's age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Son; and that there was great cause why in the Story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

IT follows now, to speak something to the Objection, which brings Abraham's age altogether together in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest Son of Terah, and born when Terah was 70 years old. For Abraham's age being made uncertain, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this Proposition, That we cannot be certain of Abraham's his age, unless we make him the eldest Son, is false. For it is plain in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205, which was the year of his death; then was Abraham 75. And if you ask, how I can judge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, That S. Stephen hath told us, that Abraham's departure followed the death of his father Terah; and Terah died at 205, so as the 75 year of Abraham was the 205 year of Terah; which known, there can be no error in the account of times succeeding. Now, to come to the Objection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect unto Nabor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham only, with whom God established the Covenant, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses, for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nabor and Haran. For the succession of God's Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nabor and Haran, were they Idolaters, or otherwise. For Nabor was the father of Bethuel, and Bethuel of Rebecca, the mother of Isaac; and Haran was the Parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcab; and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and Grandmother to Jacob; Milcab also, the wife of Nabor, and mother of Bethuel, was Jacob's great Grandmother; and the age of Sarah, the Daughter of Haran, is especially noted, in that it pleased God to give her a Son 890 years, and when by nature she could not have conceived. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet, because both Nabor and Abraham married the Daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grand-child of Nabor; and Jacob, Lea, and Rachel, the Daughters of Laban, the grand-child also of Nabor; it was not superfluous in Moses to give light of those mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange gods, as it is, Jos. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to think, that they still continued Idolaters. For they believed and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leaving their natural Country and City of Ur in Chaldea, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his father Terah, ere they left Chaldea; but Lot, his Son, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nabor also, who remained at Charran, gave his Sons daughters to Isaac, & Jacob, his own kinsmen: he himself having also married in his own Family; not thinking it pleasing unto God, to mix themselves with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length believed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For, when Laban had seen the servant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, he invited him to his Fathers house in this manner, Come in, thou blessed of Jehovah, &c. And when this servant of Abraham's demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said, This thing is proceeded of Jehovah; meaning, that it was the will of the true God it should be so; wherein he acknowledged God's providence. Likewise in the following verse, it is written; Take, go, that she may be thy Masters Sons wife, even as Jehovah hath said. This their often using of the name of Jehovah, which is the proper name of the true God, is a sign that they had the knowledge of him.

Now, although it be the opinion of Chrysostom, and some late Writers, as Cajetan, Oleaster, Mugulus, Calvin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because he retained certain Idols, or household-gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet, that he believed in the true God, it cannot be denied. For he acknowledgeth the God of Abraham and of Nabor, and he called Abraham's servant, blessed of Jehovah, as aforesaid. So as, for my self, I dare not avow, that these men were out of the Church, who, sure I am, were not out of the Faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Gen. II. v. 26. doth not prove, that he was the eldest; together with divers reasons, proving that Abraham was not the eldest Son of Terah.

TO the main Objection; which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strive to shorten the times, endeavour to prove that Abraham was the eldest Son of Terah, and born in the 70 year of Terah's life; grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture; And Terah lived seventy years, Gen. II. 6. and begat Abraham, Nabor, and Haran: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no proof at all that he was the eldest and first-born Son of Terah. For it is no necessary consequent, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest eldest in blood and birth; neither doth it appear, that it pleased God to make especial choice of the first Sons in nature and time: for Seh was not the first-born of Adam; nor Isaac of Abraham; nor Jacob of Isaac; nor Juda and Joseph of Jacob; nor David the eldest of Jesse; nor Solomon of David; as is formerly remembered.

But it is written of Noah: Noah was 500. years old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japhet: shewing, that at the 500. year of his age, he began to beget the first of those three Sons. For, according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo natiuitatis, sed significatio future dignitatis: in qua excelluit Abraham: The order of nativity is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignity, in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the Sons of Noah, so is it here; where it is said, That Terah lived 70. years, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: For it was late ere Terah began to beget Sons, himself being begotten by his father Nahor, at 29. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah: for whereas Adam begat Seh at 135. Enoch Kenan at 90. Kenan Mahalel at 70. Mahalel Jared at 60. Noah was yet 500. years old when he began to beget the first of his three Sons, as aforesaid. And Saint Augustine, in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the Opinion, that Abraham was the youngest of Terah's Sons, than otherwise: though for his excellency he was worthily named first. His own words are these: Fieri enim ut potuit posterior sit generatus Abraham: sed merito excellentia, qua in Scripturis valde commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, saith he, that Abraham was begotten later; but was first named, in regard of his excellency, for which in Scripture he is much commended. So as the naming first or last, proveth nothing who was first or last born; either in those issues of Noah, or in those of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spiritual blessing; for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest and first in Gods favour. Pietas ergo, vel ipsa potius electio diuina, quæ conitum fecit trahit pietatem; & Dei timor, primas parat dat Semo in liberis Noa, & Abrahamo in liberis Thare: Piety, saith he, or rather diuine election, which doth evermore draw with it, or after it, Piety, and the fear of God, gave place and precedence to Sem among the children of Noah, and to Abraham among those of Thare.

For the rest, it is manifest, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. year of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Ishmael, when Abraham had lived 86. years. It was at Gerar (the fourth border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had consumed 100. years. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan, that Abraham rose out, when he refused Lot, & overthrew Auraphel; and he had then but the age of 83. years; and it is as manifest, that he parted from Haran after his father Terah was dead. But, if Terah begat Abraham at 70. years old, then must Abraham have been 135. years when he first set his foot in Canaan, seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. make 205. the true age of Terah, which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembered. For he entred at 75. he refused Lot at 83. he had Ishmael at 86. he had Isaac at 100. proved by the former places.

Moreover, if Abraham were the eldest Son of Terah, and born in the 70. year of his age; then had Terah lived till Isaac had been 35. years old, and Ishmael 49. both which must then have been born in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: unless we should either deny credit to S. Stephen, who saith, that Abraham departed from Mesopotamia after his fathers death: or else believe the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrotor, who in his Cronologia antioptica, saith it was about his fathers death; because the Greek word παύω may be translated by the Latine sub, as well as by post: which, though elsewhere it may be, yet cannot be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say, that those things were done about Terah's death, which were 60. years before. Wherefore, supposing Abraham to have been born in the 70. year of Terah, we must give those times and places of birth to Abraham's children, which no Authority will warrant; for Abraham had no children in Ur or Chaldea, nor in Haran, nor in ten years after his arrival into Canaan. For the year of Terah's death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the year of the World, 2083. and the year of Ishmael's birth was the Worlds year, 2094. which maketh ten years difference. And that Isaac was born in Canaan, and was to be offered upon the mountain Moriab therein, 39. miles from Beersabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appear'd to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot be, that any of Abraham's Sons were born in Mesopotamia; nor while Terah lived; nor in less than ten years after Terah's death; and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest Son of Terah, nor born in the 70. year of Terah's age.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75. if Terah had begotten him at 70. then then had Terah lived but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which must also have been the full age of Terah; but Terah lived 205. years, and therefore was not Abraham born in the 70. year of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldest brother of Abraham's; for Sarah, or Ischah, wanted but ten years of Abraham's age; Isaac being born when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. years old.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had been the elder brother of Haran, Haran must have begotten Sarah at nine years old: for granting that Haran was born but one year after Abraham, and Sarah within ten years as old as Abraham, then of necessity must Haran beget her, when he had lived but nine years, which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Ischah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names; saith he, bearing the same signification; and names of principality. Again, to what end was the word Ischah of Ischah inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant: thereby? For, to speak of any thing superfluous, it is not used in Gods Book: and if Ischah had not belonged to the Story, it had been but an idle name, to no purpose remembered.

Now, if it had been true (as those of the contrary opinion affirm) that Moses had no respect of Nahor and Haran, who were notwithstanding the Parents of Bethuel and Rebecca, the mother of Isaac, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Ischah in this place, were the not Sarah, but otherwise an idle name, of whom there is nothing else first or last?

The age also of Lot disproveth the elder-ship of Abraham; for Lot was called an old man, when Abraham was but 83. years old: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were father to Lot, Sarah, and Milcah; Abraham marrying one of Haran's Daughters, and Nahor the other, Sarah also being within ten years as old as Abraham; may appear to every reasonable man (not obstinate and prejudicate) that Haran was the eldest Son of Terah, and not Abraham; who also died first, and before his father left Ur in Chaldea. Also Lyra reasoneth against this opinion of Abraham's elder-ship, upon the same place of Genesis; drawing arguments from the age of Sarah, who was but ten years younger than Abraham himself. Lyra's words are these: Si igitur Haran fuit junior ipso Abraham, sequitur quod non habebat decem annos quando genuit Saram: imò nec octo, &c. and afterward, Quod ideo melius videtur dicendum, quod Abraham fuit ultimus na-

tus de tribus filiis Thare, tamen nominatur primò, propter ejus dignitatem: & ponendū erat caput stirpis, & generationis sequenti: & quia primò facta est ei repositio expressa de Christo, sicut supra dictum est de Sem, &c. si therefore (saith Lyra) Haran was younger than Abraham himself, it followeth, that he was not ten years old when he begat Sarah: And therefore it seemeth better to be said, that Abraham was the last born of the three Sons of Thare, nevertheless, he is named first for his dignity, both because he was to be ordained head of the stock and generation following, and because the Promise of Christ was first made unto him, as before it is said of Sem.

A conclusion of this Dispute, noting the Authors on both sides; with an Admonition, that they which flourish the times, make all ancient Stories the more improbable.

It therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reason, that Haran was the eldest Son of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was born in the 130. year of Terah's life, and not in the 70. year. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S. Stephen, and that journey by Abraham performed, when he was 75. years old; these two numbers added, make 205. years, the full age of Terah: seeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my self, I have no other end herein, than to manifest the Worlds Story. I reverence the judgments of the Fathers: but I know they were mistaken in particulars. Saint Augustine was doubtful, and could not determine this controverſie. For, whatsoever is borrowed out of his sixteenth Book de Civitate Dei, cap. 15. the same may be answered out of himself in his five and twentieth Question upon Genesis. But S. Augustine herein followed Josephus and Isidor; and Zedda followed S. Augustine. And it was out of a foolish pride and vanity, that the Hebrews and Josephus sought to make Abraham the first born: as if God had had respect to the eldest in nature. So did Josephus, together with Nicholas Damascenus (thinking thereby to glorifie the Jewish Nation) make Abraham a King, entitling Sarah by the name of Queen Sarah; and said, that Abraham was followed with 318. Captains, of which every one had an infinite multitude under him; trecentos & octodecim milites habuit, quorum singulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Pharaoh invading him with a great Army, took from him his Wife Sarah: Such Fables argue that that Josphus is not to be believed, but with discreet reservations.

This account of times, allowing no more than 322. years from the Flood to Abraham, is upheld by many of the Hebrews. But how should we value the opinion of such Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod's Surely, if their judgment in such matters were worthy to be regarded, it would have appeared in settling down the succession of the Hebrew Kings whom they lived, whose history was not so far remote in time, as the Antiquaries, nor wanting the light of many good Writers. Yet grossly have they erred therein, and to familiar are their mistakes in all things of like nature, that we seldom find their opinion rehearsed without the contumacious treading on the heels of it. They of the Roman Religion, are also generally on the same side; it being a thing usual among them, to maintain whatsoever they have been formerly known to hold, and believe. Contrariwise, of the more ancient, Theodoret, and some following him, of later times, Jerome, Beza, Calvin, Junius, Beza, Brereton, Dod, Gibbons, and Moore, with divers of the Protestants, hold Abraham to have been born in the 130. year of his father Terah. From these (as in a case not concerning any point in Religion) divers of the same Religion, and those, nevertheless, good Authors, as Eusebius, Chiriacus, Fundanus, and others, are very averse herein, especially Josphus Scaliger with his seignior Calvisius, proclaiming Berosus an arch-heretic in Chronology, and condemning this opinion of his as poisonous. Contrariwise, Augustinus Tornellus, a Priest of the Congregation of S. Paul, a judicious, diligent, and free Writer, whose Annals are newly set forth, very earnestly defends the opinion, which I have already delivered; not alleging Berosus, nor any Protestant Writer, as being, perhaps, unwilling to owe thanks to Hereticks. For my self, I do neither mislike the contrary opinion, because commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to uphold it; nor favour this later account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant Writers have approved it; but for the truth it self. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will add thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparent to all men of judgment, that the best approved Historians, divine, and prophane, labour to investigate the truth of times, thereby to approve the Stories, and fore-past actions of the World; and not the truth of Histories to approve the times by. Let us then make judgment to our selves, which of those two accounts give the best reputation to the Story of the Scriptures, teaching the World a new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Josphus, and those which follow him, who make but 322. years, or those abouts, between the Flood and Birth of Abraham, at this other, accounts, which make 352. years between the one and the other; the first making Abraham to be the first-born of Shem, in the 70. year of his life, the other a younger Son of Shem, and born when he had lived 120. years. And, if we look over all, and do not hastily satisfy our understanding with the first things offered, and thereby being seduced do foolishly and drowsily sit down; we shall find it more agreeable, rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some Editions make it above 1070. years between the Flood and Abraham's Birth; than to take away any part of those 352. years given. For, if we advisedly consider the state and continuance of the World, such as it was in Abraham's time, yea, before Abraham was born, we shall find, that it were very ill done of us, by following the opinion without the guide of reason, to have the times over-deeply between Abraham and the Flood; because in cutting them too near the quick, the reputation of the whole Story might, perchance, bleed thereby, were not the testimony of the Scriptures supreme; so no objection can approach it; and that we did not follow withal this Precept of S. Augustine. That, whereforever any one place in the Scriptures may be conceived disagreeing to the whole, the same is, by ignorance of interpretation, misunderstood. For, in Abraham's time, all the then known parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings; Egypt had many magnificent Cities; and so had Palestine, and all the bordering Countries, yea, all that part of the World besides, as far as India; and those not built with sticks, but of hewn stone, and defended with walls and rampires; which magnificence needed a Parent of more antiquity, than those other men have supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and marvels? giving also strength thereby to common cavillers, and to those mens apish brains, who only bend their wits to find impossibilities, and monsters in the Story of the World and Man-kind.

In this sort therefore, for the reasons before alleged, I conclude, that from the general Flood, to the birth of Abraham, 352. years were consumed; and taking the Affinity with us, the same number of years were spent from the Flood to the 43. year of Ninus in which 43. year of Ninus, Abraham was born; which happened in the year of the World, 2009.

Now, of this time of 992. years, we must give one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinar, as to those that stayed in the East; to wit, 30. years to Chus; the he begat Seba; of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet, because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first Sons, we may the more safely give the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg again at 30. Reu at 32. Now, after Seba, Chus begat Heviah, Adia, Rama and Sabitecha; and Rama begat Sheba and Deban, before Nimrod was born, as it appears, Gen. 10. which S. Augustine approveth. Giving then 30. years more to Rama ere he begat Sheba, and five years to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered, that 65. years were consumed ere Nimrod himself was born; and that Rama had chanced before any of his Sons were begotten; it may be gathered by example and comparison; for Peleg the fourth from Noah, as Rama was, begat Reu in the same year of his life.

Let us then allow 60. years more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly find people to build Babel; for sure we are, that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125. The rest of the time of 131. (in which year they arrived in Shinar, whereof there are six years remaining) we may give them for their travels from the East; because they were pestered with women, children and cattle: and, as some ancient Writers have conceived, and Berosus of later times, they kept always the mountain sides, for fear of a second flood. Now, if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remains 221. of which number, Berosus bestoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus before Abraham born: both which, S. Augustine approveth: which two numbers taken again out of 221. there remaineth 114. years of the 352. from the Flood to Abraham's birth; which number of 114. necessity bestoweth on Nimrod.

And if it be objected, that this time given to Nimrod is over-long; sure, if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appear over short. For Nimrod, by this account, lived in all but 179. years, whereof he reigned 112. whereas Sale, who was the Son of Abraham, the Son of Shem, lived 403. years; and of the same age of the World was Nimrod, the Son of Chus, the Son of Cham.

Now, after Abraham was born, Ninus reigned 9. years, which added to 43. make 52. Ninus dieth, and leaveth Semiramis his Successour.

Semiramis governed the Empire of Babylonia and Assyria 40. years, and died in the 52. year complete of Abraham's life.

Nimrod, or Semiramis succeeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. years; in the second year of whose reign, Abraham left Aleppo for Uruk. When Abraham was 85. years old, he rescued his Nephew Lot, and overthrew by surprise Amraphel, King of Shinar, or Babylonia. Nimrod reigned 38. years, and Abraham came into Chanaan but 32. years after Semiramis died: which was the 75. year of his age; so that Amraphel may seem to have been this Nimrod, the Son of Ninus, and Semiramis whole 23. years, as afore said, being the 75. year of Abraham, he and his fellow Kings might have received this overthrow in the 85. year of Abraham, and the 32. year of his own reign: after which he reigned five years, which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, urging that Amraphel could not be Nimrod, are not easily answered. Howbeit, for the times of the Assyrian Kings, that they are to be ordered as we have set down, according to the times noted by Moses in the Story of Abraham, it is most certain; unless we will either derogate from the truth of Moses his computation; which were impious, or account the whole History of Ninus and Semiramis to be a bare fiction; which were to condemn all ancient Historians for Fables.

That Amraphel, one of the four Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have been Nimrod the Son of Ninus.

And now, touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes King of Shinar, or Babylonia, in the 85. year of Abraham's life, that is, in

in the 33. year of the reign of Ninus Zameh the King of the Assyrians, the Son of Ninus and Stethranis; it is hard to affirm what he was, and how he could be at this time King of Babylonia: Ninus Zameh then reigning there. To this doubt, the answer which first offereth it self as most probable, is that which hath been already noted, that this Ninus, or Zameh, was no other than our Amraphel; who invaded Traconitis, or Babylonia; and overthrew those five Kings of Pentapolis, in the Valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell us, that Amraphel was King of Shinar; which is Babylonia; and the times before accounted make him to be the successor of Ninus and Semiramis; and it falleth out with the 85. year of Abraham's life, wherein he rescu'd Lot from Chedorlaomer, and overthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarch for Chedorlaomer commanded in chief, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first Verse of the fourteenth Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the Valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or the five Cities, were the vassals of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel; as it is written, Twelve years were they subject to Chedorlaomer, but in the thirteenth year they rebelled, and in the fourteenth year came Chedorlaomer, and the Kings that were with him; and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principal in this enterprise, who was then King of Elam which is Persia. Now, Persia being seated over Tygris, and to the East of Amraphel's Country; and the other two Kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the West of Shinar, or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it self, seemeth at this time to have had no great scope or large Dominion. For, had Amraphel been so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis, whom he succeeded, he should not have needed the assistance of three or four Kings for this Expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those four Kings (as it is manifest that he was: For these little Kings of Sodome, Gomora, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphel's) yet this makes not the conjecture less probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninus. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria had now (as we shall shew more plainly in that which followeth) received a down-right fall at the time of this War: though not long before it commanded all the Kingdoms between India and the Phenician Sea; to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

4. X.

Of Arioch; another of the four Kings, and Shabellus; whereof he is said to have been King, lies between Calydonia and Arabia Petraea.

NOW, the two other Kings, joined with Amraphel and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tidal; the one King of Elkassur the other of the Nations of Porcellus, Aquila, and Antioch, where Pontus is to be found, thinketh that it should be Hellepont; which opinion Berovius favoureth. But this is onely to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus is Hellepont far distant, and out of the way to send any Armies into Arabia Petraea, as to Idumaea, which Countieys these four Kings chiefly invaded. Besides that, it is certain, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had never any dominion in Asia the less. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the invasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the less as Commanders; but used all the art they had, to invite Craus to their assistance; perswading him, that nothing could be more dangerous for himself, and the other Kings of those parts, than the success of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprise, what it was. These Kings (saith the Text) made war with Bera, Kingdom of Sodome; Birha, King of Gomora, Shinar, King of Adumuth, and Shemebat, King of Zebonim; and the Kings of Bela, which is Zoar. All which five Kings had not so much ground as Middlesex; being such a kind of Reguli; as Joshua found in the Land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small Territories adjoining; of which Canaan had three and thirty, all slain or hanged by Joshua. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to have invaded, be imagined to have been at that time of any great power; and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus, or Hellepont, had manifested a great impotence and weakness in the Kings of Babylon and Persia.

And though it be alleged for an Example, that divers Kings far off, came to assist Pompey against Cesar; yet these same examples, without like occasions and circumstances, do neither lead nor teach. For there was no cause to fear the greatness of these petty Kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the World were fixed on Cesar; and his undertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no less doubtful than fearfull: But the whole Country by these four Kings mastered in their passage, was afterward given to the half Tribe of Manasse.

Manasse, Gad, and Reuben; a narrow Valley of ground, lying between Jordan and the Mountains of Seir; inclosed by the River of Arnon on the South side; and by Lybani on the North, consisting of two small Provinces of Traconitis, or Babylonia, and the Region of the Moabites; a conquest far unvaluable, and little answering to the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus and Semiramis; who subjected all the great Kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellepont, or any other part of Asia the less. But as the Vulgar, and Aquila, convert Elkassur by Pontus: So Symmachus makes Arioch, a King of the Scythians; a King indeed; as far fetched to join with the Assyrians in this War, as the World had any at that time.

The Septuagint do not change the word of Elkassur at all, but as they keep the word Ararat, on the Mountains whereof the Ark did rest; so do they in this place retain the word Elkassur, being doubtfull to give it a wrong interpretation. And Peterinus himself remembereth other opinions far more probable than this of Pontus, or Hellepont: yet he dares not avow his liking of them, because the Latine Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Urbibus, a Grecian Cosmographer, findeth the City of Ellam in the border of Calydonia; and Saint Hierom calleth Ellas the City of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now, although the same be seated by Stephanus in Calydonia, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was King; who formerly joined with Ninus in all his Conquests, being of the same Family; and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrew written Arioch; and afterward again Arctas; as in the Machabees: the Kings of Arabia holding that name even to the time of S. Paul, who was sought to be betrayed by the Licutenant of Arctas, commanding in Damascus. They were Princes, for the most part, confederate and depending upon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that we find in Daniel; that in the time of Nebuchodonosor, one Arioch was General of his Army, and the principal Commander under him, who was a King of Kings: which makes it plain, that Arioch here spoken of, the Son of that Arioch, confederate of Ninus, was no King of Pontus, nor of Scythia, Regions far removed from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch, who commanded under Nebuchodonosor, is mentioned in Judith, by the name of King of the Elymeans; who are a Nation of Persians, bordering Assyria, according to Stephanus, though Pliny sets it between the Sea-coast and Media; and if any brother of the Arabian Kings; or other of that House (known by the name of Arius, Arioch, Arctas, or Arctas) had the Government of that Persian Province, called Elymais (as it seemeth they had; by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the same was in Nebuchodonosor's time. But this Arioch here spoken of, may with more reason be taken for the King of Arabia, the Son of Arius, the confederate of Ninus, whose Sons held league, as their fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West unto Babylonia; and Chaldea; and in amity with them from the beginning, and of their own House and Blood; which Diod. Siculus also confirmeth.

Of Tidal, another of the four Kings.

THE fourth King by Abraham overthrown, was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Gogim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name. Lysa of mixt People; Calvin of Runnagates without habitation. Peterinus out of Strabo findeth that Galilea was inhabited by divers Nations, which were a mixt People; namely, of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phenicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galileam habitant; such are the inhabitants of Galilee, saith Strabo; and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And so it may be; but the authority of Strabo is nothing in this Question. For Galilea was not Peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For, when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanites were then in the Land, howsoever they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not. But there are many petty Kingdoms adjoining to Phoenicia and Palestina; as Palmyrena, Balanea, Laodicene, Apamena, Chalcidice, Cassiope, Chalibonitis, and all these do also join themselves to Mesopotamia on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselves together under Tidal, I take to be the probablest conjecture.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer, the chief of the four kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia; and that the Assyrian Empire at that time was much impaired.

Lastly, whereas it is conceived that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, or that Amraphel was but a Satrap, Viceroy, or Provincial Governour of Babylon, and that the other Kings named, were such also, I can not agree with Penterius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assyria and Shinar; to call the Assyrian a King of Shinar; those Kings being in the Scriptures evermore called by the name of Chaldea, Shinar, Babylonia, or Assyria; but never by Shinar; and Chedorlaomer, or Chedorlaomer was so called of Chaldea, from Chaldea, which in the Hebrew signifieth Regle; for so Chaldea is called the garment which the Persian Kings wore on their heads.

Neither do I believe, that the Assyrian, or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatness at the time of this invasion; and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach us, that those things which are set up hastily, or forced violently, do not long last. Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as is talked not to overlook what it self had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetual. For his Empire died at once with himself; all whose chief Commanders became Kings after him. Tambranes conquered Asia and India, with a storm-like, and terrible force; but to prevalent fury, God hath adjoined a short life; and whatsoever things Nature her self worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his Victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus, being the first whom the madness of boundless dominion transported, invaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious over them: a man violent, insolent and cruel. Semiramis taking the opportunity, and being more proud, adventurous, and ambitious than her Paramour; enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein, with buildings un-exampled. But her Son, having changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proved no less feminine than she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continual smart, put the Patient in mind how to cure the one, and revenge the other: so those Kings adjoining (whose subjection and calamities incident, were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleep with the advantage was offered by such a success. For, Imreza Babylonian his paramour had in this King, joined little (with Nabuchodonosor) in the Babylonian Kingdom; and likely it is, that the neck of mortal men, having been never before galled with the yoke of foreign dominion, nor having even had experience of that most miserable and detestful condition of living in slavery; nor being content having as yet invaded the Assyrian, much less rights nor any other title being for his conquest, than a strong hand; the people did esteemate Son of a tyrannous and hated King, could very ill hold so many great Nations and Nations his vassals, with a powerful mastering, and a mind less industrious than his father and mother had used before him. And he that was so much given over to licentious idleness, as to suffer his mother to reign 42. years; and cherched the greatest pain after he came to mans estate; who did thereby to the World; that he so much preferred ease before honour; and bodily pleasures before greatness, he he neither vowed to gain what he could not govern, nor to keep what he could not without contentous peril enjoy.

These considerations being joined to the Story of Amraphel, delivered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinar was rather an inferior to the King of Persia than either his superior, or equal; make it seem probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken to shivers, and restrained again to Babylonia.

For conclusion, I will add these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great travel upon Abraham, from Ur in Chaldea to Charran, and then to Canaan; a passage of 700 miles, or little less, with women, children, and carriages; the Countries through which he wandered were then settled, and in peace. For it was the 29. year of Ninus, when Abraham obeying the voice of God, took this great journey in hand; in which time of 23. years after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recovered their liberty and former estates. For Semiramis Army of four millions, with her self utterly consumed in India, and all her armies and engines of war, at the same time lost, gave an occasion and opportunity even to the poorest souls and weakest hearted of the World; to repurchase their former liberty.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and antientest Historians, that Arus the Son of Ninus, or Amraphel, invaded the Medians, and Cassians, and again subjected them:

which needed not, if they had not been revolted from Ninus, after Ninus's death. And as Arus recovered one part; so did Babylon, or Assyria, other parts recover, reduce the rest of Assyria to their former obedience. Of which it is said, that he spewed from Egypt Arus, and therefore was called Xerxes, to signify, a conqueror, and conqueror and lord of a great Empire. And it is not to be thought, that such Kings had been no other, than the effects of modesty, had not these Countries freed themselves from the Assyrian subjection. Now, it is well made any doubt thereof, that is, of the conquest of Assyria and Xerxes, both which lived after Ninus, and Semiramis; we may as well think the rest of Ninus, and Semiramis to be but stoned; but if we grant the conquest, then it is true, that Arus, Ninus, or Amraphel ruled the Assyrian Empire, was upon a sudden, according to that which had been gathered out of Moses, as before remembered.

§. XIII.

That it is not improbable that the four Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves; and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came; which if so, we need not say, that Amraphel was Ninus, nor Arus the Son of Ninus with many other difficulties.

The consent of all Writers, whose works I have come to my perusal, agreeing as they do, that these four Kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and their fellows, were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they were, or seem intitled; doth almost force us to think, that the history must so be understood, as I have delivered; But, if in this place, as often elsewhere in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be let for People of those Lands, or if (as Thirom hath it) Chedorlaomer was King of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is of People, either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry Regions; then may we otherwise conceive of this History: removing thereby some difficulties; which men, perhaps, have been unwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolve them: For, as it had been a strange conjecture, to think that Arus was drawn to assist the Persian against the Sodamites, as far as from Kontur, where it is very unlikely that Chedorlaomer was known, and almost impossible, that the vale of Siddim should have been once named; so in true estimation, it is a thing of great improbability, that Chedor- laomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should pass through so great a part of the World, as the countries of Assyria, Chaldea, Medopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan; to subdue those five Towns, whose very names how they should come to his ear, being disjoined by so many great Nations of different languages, a wife man could hardly conjecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia, together with the Babylonian himself, great the Kingdom of Elam and that of Tidal, so far off removed, were become his dependences; what reason can we find that might have induced him to hearken after Sodoma and Gomorrath? and when he should have sought the establishment of his new gotten Empire, by rooting out the Posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Phurim of Media, and Zoraster of Babylonia) then to employ the forces of Amraphel, and these other Kings, against five petty Towns, leaving Tyrus and Sidon, and the great City Damascus, with many other places of much importance, and far nearer unto him, unsubdued? Now, as these doubts, which may be alleged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement, so are the objections to be made against his conquest of these five Cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea, and more, as being grounded upon the Text itself. For first, what madness had it been in that small Province, to rebel against so powerful a Monarch? Or if it were so, that they dwelling far from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, than that he should come or send to reclaim them; was it not more than madness in them, when his terrible Army approached, still to entertain hope of evasion; yea, to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute, and therefore unwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations between Babylonia, yea, between themselves and the River Indus? Likewise, on the part of Chedorlaomer, we should find no great wisdom, if he, knowing the weakness of this People, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any Lieutenant, with small forces, he might have subdued. For the perpetual inheritance of that little Country, was not sufficient to countervail one Months charges of so huge an Army. How small then must his valour have been, who with so mighty preparations effected no more than the wasting of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities standing; taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Country, although he had broken their Army in the field? Now, the Scriptures do not of this invasion (supposed to great) make any fearful matter; matter; but compose the two Armies as equally matcht, laying they were four Kings against five; yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall find that Abraham slew all these Kings; of which great slaughter no History makes mention: Neither will the reign of Nimias, who lived four or five years longer, permit that he should have died so soon; neither would Histories have forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appears, that these four Kings were not the same that they are commonly thought; nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them: It may therefore well be true, that these Kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title; Lords and Commanders, every one of his own company, which he carried forth as a Colony, seeking place where to settle himself and them, as was the usual manner of those times.

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troop of Perfians, Amraphel some people out of Shinaar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might consort together, and make the weakest of the Country which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoever will consider the beginning of the first Book of Thucydides, with the manner of discoveries, conquests and plantations, in the infancy of Greece; or the manner of the Saracens invading Africa and Spain, with almost as many Kings as several Armies; or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoveries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies; may easily perceive, that it was neither unusual for the leaders of Colonies to receive title from the people, whom they conducted; nor to make alliances together, and break them again, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel, and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seem the more likely, by the slothfull quality of Nimias then reigning in Afria; whose unmanlike temper was such, as might well give occasion to such undertaking spirits, as wanted the employments whereunto they were accustomed in the reign of Semiramis, rather to seek adventures abroad, than to remain at home unregarded, whilst others, more unworthy than themselves, were advanced. If the consent of the whole stream of Writers upon this place, make this conjecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authority whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selves to the former conjecture, Amraphel was Nimias; and that the power of his Ancestors being by his sloth decayed, he might well be inferior to the Perfian Chedorlaomer: or if this do not suffice, we may say that Amraphel was an under-King, or Satrapa of Shinaar, under Nimias; who may be supposed to have had his Imperial Seat in his fathers City, Nimias; and to have preferred it before Shinaar and Babylon the City of his mother, whom he hated as an usurper of his right. But, if it were possible that in a case not concerning any mans salvation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great pains, all might erre; then can I think that the opinion, that those four Kings were Leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countries themselves, is most consonant, both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And hereto add, that Chedorlaomer seems rather called a Perfian King, than King of Persia: And that Arioch (whose Kingdom undoubtedly was between Syria and Arabia) having been a man of action, or being a worthy man's Son, was very well pleased to give passage and assistance to these Captains or petty Kings. These, and such like things here to urge, were but with circumstances to adorn a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is unworthy to have cost bestowed upon it; especially considering, that it is not my intent to employ any more time in making it good, but to leave it wholly to the Reader's pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he find any that shall seem better than these. But of what countries or people forever these four were Kings, this Expedition is the only publick action that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to this Story, and of his Sons, and of his Nephews, Ejau and Jacob, as they are registred by Moses, because it is not our purpose, either to stand upon things generally known to all Christians, nor to repeat what hath been else-where already spoken, nor to prevent our selves in things that may hereafter in due place be remembered, we pass them here in silence. And because in the Story of Abraham and his Posterity, there is much mention of Egypt: by which it appears, that even in the time of Abraham, it was a settled and flourishing Kingdom; it will not be amiss in the next place to speak somewhat of the Antiquities and first Kings thereof.

CHAP.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Egypt, from the first Peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A brief of the names and times of the first Kings of Egypt; with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

Soon after the confusion at Babel (as it seems) Cham, with many of his issue and followers (having doubtless known the fertility of Egypt before the Flood) came thither and took possession of the Country; in which they built many Cities; and began the Kingdom one hundred ninety one years after the Deluge. The ancient Governours of this Kingdom, till such time as Israël departed Egypt, are shewn in the Table following.

An. Mundi.	An. dil.	Cham.
1847.	191.	Cham .
2008.	352.	Osiris .
2269.	613.	Typhon } Hercules .
2276.	620.	Orus .
2391.	735.	Sesostris the great.
2424.	768.	Sesostris the blind.
2438.	782.	Bufris , or Osiris the second.
2476.	820.	Acencheres , or Thermuthis , or Merk .
2488.	832.	Rathoris , or Athoris .
2497.	841.	Chencheres drowned in the Red Sea.

The Table, and especially the Chronologie, is to be confirmed by probabilities and conjectures, because in such obscurity, manifest and restless truth cannot be found. For Saint Augustine, a man of exceeding great judgement, and incomparable diligence, who had sought into all Antiquities, and had read the Books of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Egyptian Kings, which he would not have done, if they had not been more uncertain than the Sicyonians, whom he remembereth, than whom doubtless they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscurity in the Egyptian Story, was the ambition of the Priests; who, to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leafings, and recounted unto strangers the names of many Kings, that never reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed Kings, it shall appear anon. Sure it is, That the magnificent Works, and royal Buildings in Egypt, such as are never found but in States that have greatly flourished, witness that their Princes were of marvelous greatness, and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Egyptian History, was the too much credulity of some good Authours, who believing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Egyptians, and publishing in their own names such as pleased them best, have confirmed them, and, as it were, enforced them upon us by their Authority. A third and general cause of more than Egyptian darkness in all ancient Histories, is the Edition of many Authors, by John Annins, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very learned, I may add mine) I think thus; that Annins having seen some fragments of those Writers, and added unto them what he would, may be credited, as an avoucher of true Histories, where approved Writers confirm him; but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it cometh to pass, that the account of Authours, either in the Chronologie, or Genealogie of the Egyptian Kings, runs three altogether different ways. The Christian Writers, such as are ancient, for the most part, follow Ensebius: Many late Writers follow the Edition of Annins his Authours; The profane Histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

§. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Cham's reign in Egypt began in the year after the Flood, 191.

To reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings about whom is most controversy, the best mean is

by help of the Dynasties; of whose continuance, there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authority of approved Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether, with the Histories of the Agyptians, Trojans, Italians, &c. and others. The beginning of the 16. Dynastie, is joined by general consent, with 43. year of Ninus; in which Abraham was born. The twelve first Dynasties lasted each of them seven years, under the twelve which were call'd the greater gods; so that all the years of their continuance were 84. The 12. Dynastie endured 14. years; the fourteenth, 26. the fifteenth, 37. These three last, are said to have been under the three younger gods. So the fifteen first Dynasties lasted 161. years. As I do not therefore believe that the continuance of these Dynasties, was such as hath been mentioned, because Annus in such wise limits out their time: so I cannot reject the account upon this only reason, that Annus hath it so; considering, that both hitherto, it hath passed as current, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie, in the year of Abraham's birth, as aforesaid, the reckoning is easily cast, by which the sum of 161. years, which, according to our account, were spent in the fifteen former, being subducted out of the sum of 322. years, which were between the Flood and Abraham's birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynastie, which was the beginning of Cham's reign in Egypt, was in the year 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appear: For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of man-kind which came into Siberia, arrived at Babel, Anno à Diluvio 131. In building the Tower were consumed 40. years, as Cyclex recordeth; whose report I have elsewhere confirmed with divers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wives, Children, Cattel, and Substance through all Syria then desolate, and full of Bogges, Forests, and Bryers (which the Deluge, and want of culture, in one hundred seventy one years had brought upon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himself in Egypt, we allow twenty years; and these summs being added together, to wit, one hundred thirty one years after the Flood, before they arrive at Babel, forty years for their stay there, and twenty for Cham's passage into Egypt, and settling there, make up the sum of 191. years; at which time we find that Cham began his reign in Egypt, in the beginning of the first Dynastie.

And to this sum of 191. years, if we add the 161. years of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbred in common account, we shall fall right with the year of Abraham's birth, which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to prove that these first Dynasties must needs have been very short, and not containing in the whole sum of their several times above 161. years; Let it suffice, that had they lasted longer, then either must Egypt have been peopled as soon as Babel after the Flood, or the Dynasties (as Moravian thinks) must have been before the Flood. That the arrival at Babel, was many years before the plantation of Egypt after the Flood, enough hath been said to prove; and that the Dynasties were not before the Flood, the number of the long-lived generations between Adam and the Flood, which was less than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witness. Or, if we will think, that one life might (perhaps) be divided into many Dynasties, then may this have been as well after the Flood, as before; considering that the Sons of Noah did not in every Country erect such form of Policy, as had been used in the same ere the Deluge; but such as the disposition of the people, the authority and power of the Conductor, together with many other circumstances, did induce or enforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not divers Families of Kings, but rather Successions of Regents, oft-times many under one King.

The short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not several races of kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to stile them. What they were, it can not certainly be warrantable. For, in reliquions of decayed Antiquities, it is more easy to deny than to affirm. But this may be said, partly upon good circumstance, partly upon the surest proof, That it was the manner of the Egyptian Kings, to put the Government of the Country into the hands of some trusty Counsellor, onely reserving the Sovereignty to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turks doth to the chief Vizier. This is confirmed, first, by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are under Cham, and more than one under Osiris, or Mizraim; and must therefore have been successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counsellors, and Regents. Secondly, by custom of such Princes

Princes borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures, of whom Abimelech the Philistin, in his dealing with Abraham and Sarac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol, Captain of his Host; though in taking Abraham's Wife, and in his private carriage, he followed his own pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech, the Son of Gideon, it was said: Is not he the Son of Jerubbaal? and Zebul is his officer? Alo Ishbohereth, the Son of Saul, feared Abner the Captain of the Host. Yea, David himself hating Joab for his cruelty, did not punish him in regard of his greatness, which was such, as was feared even of Hadad the Edomite, living then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the Scriptures: therefore likely, both by his own idleness and pleasure, to have laid the burthen of the Government upon others; and upon jealousy, the companion of unworthiness, to have changed his Lieutenants often. Above all other proofs is the advancement of Joseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Joseph, Only in the Kings Throne will I be above thee: behold, I have set thee over all the Land of Egypt. William Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the year of our Lord, one thousand one hundred eighty, affirms that the like, or very same, form of Government by Viceroy, was in his time practised in Egypt, having there been in use (as he believed) ever since the time of Joseph. He plainly shews, that the Soldans of Egypt were not Lords of the Country, however they have been so deemed; but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the duty of subjects unto the Caliphs; who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not onely of civil Government, but the power of making War and Peace, with the whole Office and Authority royal, into the Soldans hands. He that shall read in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliphs, or Mulene Eddadech, with the form of his Court, shall plainly behold the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lieutenant, as great in authority as Joseph was, though far inferior in Wisdom.

To think that many names of such Regents, or Lieutenants, as Joseph was, have crept into the List of the Egyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Joseph's brethren call him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countrey; besides, it is not unlikely, that the vain-glorious Egyptian Priests would as easily report him a King to posterity, as ignorant men & strangers deem him such, under whose hand all dispatches of importance, and royal managing of the State had passed, whilest that the King himself, intending his quiet, had given his Office to another. How strangers have mistaken in this kind, the example already cited of Joseph's brethren, doth sufficiently witness. The reports of Priests do appear in Diodorus, and Herodotus; each of whom, citing their relations, as good Authority, say; Diodorus, and Scythris was the nineteenth King after Menas; Herodotus, that he was the 332. after Menas; which could not have been, if Menas had been Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many Races of Kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the Kings of so many sundry Linages or sorts of men. Now, by whatsoever means a Dynastie, or Regency continued; whether in one Family, as being made an hereditary Office; or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is, that was the Kings gift and free choice, that gave the Office. But the Crown royal always passed by descent, and not by election; which (besides consent of Authors) the Scriptures also prove. For whereas Joseph bought all the Land of Egypt for Pharaoh, if the Crown had passed by election, then should Pharaoh's children hereby, either have been intruded amongst the rest of the people, to the next successor; or enjoying their fathers Land, though not his Estate, have been more mighty than the King: as, Land-lords of all Egypt, and the King himself their Tenant. Likewise we find in Exod. 12. that God smote the first-born of Pharaoh, that was to sit on his Throne. And in Ezay, it is said of Pharaoh, I am the Son of the antient King.

§. IV.

Of Cham, and his Son Mizraim, or Osiris.

That the succession of Kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Cheberus, now it followeth to shew. Egypt is called in the Scripture the Land of Ham. That this name is not given to it, because the Posterity of Cham did reign there, but for that himself did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances. For I think it is no where found, that the Countries of Chush, Eti, or Canaan, as well as Egypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further, it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Osiris calleth himself the eldest Son of Cham, saying, Mibi pater Saturnus deorum omnium junior: alio, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoso ortum; which must needs be understood of Cham; for this Saturnus Aegyptius was Cham:

as it is said, that on the Monument of Ninus was an Inscription, wherein Cham was called Saturus Egyptianus. Likewise the Temple of Hammon, not far from Egypt, doth testify, that Ham reigned in those parts: And S. Hieron, in questionibus Hebraicis, saith, that the Egyptians themselves did in his days, call their Country Ham; as in four several places in the Psalms this Country is called the Land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plutarch in Offide, that in the sacrifices of the Egyptians this Country of Egypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia, ut puto (saith he) a Chamo Noes filio, to which also he addeth out of Isidore, Egyptum usque hodie Egyptianum lingua Kam vocari, that Egypt unto this day in the tongue of the Egyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Cham's reign, the same reasons may suffice to be alleged, which I have already given in proof of the time spent in the 15. first Dynasties: Neither is it strange, that the reign of Cham should last so long as 161. years; considering that Sem lived 600. Arphaxad and Shelah each above 400. But question it had been, if one Salus created by Menecho, had in those long-lived generations reigned there 19. years, and with Badu, Apachin, Apochin, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glory of Orus, Orus, and Sesoftris; Reimeccius in Histor. Julia, placeth Mizaraim next, otherwise called Offis according to Diadornus, who saith he, was the Son of Hammon: Krentzenhemius saith, that Mizaraim and Offis are words of near affinity and found in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoever it be, we know, that Mizaraim the Son of Cham, was Lord of Egypt, and Reimeccius, citing good authority in this case, affirmeth that Egypt is now called by the naturals in their own language, Mesra. Neither do I see cause of doubt whether Offis were the same with Mizaraim. It is more necessary, and hard to find manifestly how long Mizaraim of Offis reigned. For whereas the year of his death is no where precisely set down, we must be fain to follow probabilities. That he is not vainly said by Annius his Berosus, to have begun his reign at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynasty of the Thebes began, it appeareth, first, by the authority of Eusebius, who voucheth as much; next, by Diadornus, who saith, that he inhabited Thebes; which habitation of Offis there, that it might be cause of that Dynasty, I can well believe; assenting to saith to Reimeccius, who thinks the Dynasties were named only, according to the several Reas of the Kings.

§. V.

Of the time when Offis reign ended; and that Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the Son of Offis.

THE death of Offis, when it was, none can certainly affirm. The onely conjecture that I know is made thus: Lebabim the Son of Mizaraim, called Hercules Lybius, made war in Italy, to revenge his fathers death on the associates of Typhon, in the 41. year of Baleus King of Affria; before which year he had made many great wars in Egypt, Phenicia, Tygris, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, &c. Spain; and having ended his Egyptian Wars, left the Kingdom to Orus. Thus saith Berosus, or Authours following Berosus. That Orus, last of all the gods (as they were filled) held the Kingdom of Isis, Diadornus Siculus plainly saith, and Plutarch as much, to which all Historians agree. Krentzenhemius hereupon infers, that six years may be allowed to the Wars, which Hercules made in so many countries, after the Egyptian Wars were ended: so should the death of Offis have been the 34. of Baleus, when himself had reigned 297. years. I think that Krentzenhemius was a greater Scholar than Souldier. For surely, in those days, when commerce was not such as now, but all Navigation made by coasting, a far longer time would have been required, to the subduing of so many Countries. An allowance of more time, though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent, which was (doubtless) to find the truth. If according to his accounts the death of Offis had been the 34. of Baleus, then must Israh have come into Egypt but 7. years before the death of Offis; and have lived there in the reign of Typhon: A thing not easily believed. For it was the same King, who advanced Israh to be his father's Successor, and gave him leave to go into Canaan, to the performance of his fathers Funerals; as may easily be gathered out of the Book of Genesis. Whereas therefore the reign of Offis cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the 7. year of Israh's coming into Egypt, we must needs cut off 27. years from that number, which Krentzenhemius conjectures his reign to have continued; namely, seven which he should have lived after Jacob's coming into Egypt, nine in which Israh had there flourished, ere his fathers coming; and other seven in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Offis, yet before Israh's advancement.

Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules's his Wars. For the War which Hercules

Hercules made in Italy, is said to have indured ten years: After which proportion, we may well give not only six years, as Krentzenhemius doth, but 23. more to so many Wars, in so many, & so far distant countries, as are named before; yea, by this proportion, we may attribute unto Orus the 13. years, which passed between the time of Israh's being sold into Egypt, unto his advancement, considering that Potiphar, who bought him, and whose daughter he may seem to have married, continued all that while chief Steward unto Pharaoh; a thing not likely to have been, if so violent alterations had hapned the whilest in Egypt, as the tyrannous usurpation of Typhon must needs have brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old Authour, I should confidently say, that Potiphar, for his faithfulness to Orus the Son of Offis, was by him, in the beginning of his reign, made his chief Steward; at which time, buying Israh, and finding him a just man, and one under whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Israh's hands, than unto any of his Egyptian followers (many of whom he had found either false-hearted, or weak and unlucky in the troublesome days of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this. Perhaps, I might proceed further, and say, That when the taying of Israh pleased Pharaoh, and all his servants; then Potiphar, Priest of On, being chief Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Israh, the antient graces of God; and his injurious imprisonment; whereupon he gave him his Daughter to Wife, and being old, resigned his Office of chief Steward unto him, who afterward, in regard of Potiphar, did favour the Priests, when he bought the Lands of all other Egyptians. This might appear to some a tale not unlike the Fable of Aesop's, Potiphar's Daughter; but, unto such as consider that God works usually by means; and that Potiphar was the Steward of that King, under whom Jacob died; it would seem a matter more probable, had it an Authour of sufficient credit to avouch it. Concerning the Wars of Hercules, in which, by this reckoning, he should have spent 42. years after he left Egypt; ere he began in Italy, it is a circumstance which (albe ledge of his Italian Wars confirmed, and his former enterprises and achievements proportioned to them) doth not make against us, but for us: or, if it were against us, yet could it not so weaken our suppositions, as these probabilities collected out of the indisputable truth of Scripture do confirm it. Nevertheless, I freely grant, that all these proofs are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authours, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscurity, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

§. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Aegyptus, Orus, and the two Sesoftrides, successively reigning after Mizaraim; and of divers Errors about the former Sesoftrides.

CONCERNING the reign of Typhon, and of Hercules, I find none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giveth three years to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is so peremptory without proof, as if his own word were sufficient authority, in many points very questionable; alleging no witness, but as it were, saying, Teste me ipso; yet herein we may think him to speak probably, for as much as the learned Krentzenhemius affirmeth, that Hercules did very soon undertake his fathers revenge; and was not long in performing it; and that leaving Egypt to his brother, he followed other Wars in the same quarrel, as hath been shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzenhemius doth) out of Berosus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon; yet, seeing Avianinus, a follower of Berosus, hath it so, I will also believe it. That in the reign of Typhon and Hercules, 7. years were spent, howsoever divided between them, I gather out of Krentzenhemius onely, who placeth the beginning of Orus seven years after the death of Offis; forgetting to set down his reasons, which in a matter so probable, I think he wanted not. Now, whereas he alloweth 90. years of the 18. Dynasty to Israh, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus; it seems that the reign of Orus lasted 115. years, from the death of Orus, to the departure of Israh out of Egypt, there passed 122. years by our account; who (according to Berosus and others) think that Abraham was born in the 130. year of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus: From the end of the Flood to the birth of Abraham 352

From that Evocation of Abraham 75 time to the departure out of Egypt 430 Summa 857
which sum divers other ways may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt, there do remain (as is aforesaid) onely 122. years from the death of Orus; we are now to consider, how many of them are to be allowed unto Sesoftris, or Sesenchosis, who is placed next unto Orus, by authority of the Scholias Apollonius not without good probability. For this great King or Conquerour, querour, is by many Histories recorded to have over-run a great part of Aſia; to have built a fleet of Ships on the Red Sea: and so to have entred into India: likewise with another fleet on the middle Earth Seas, to have passed into Europe, and subdued many Nations. This is he (as Reineccius judgeth) whom Justin, erring in account of his time, calleth Vexoris; For Justin placeth Vexoris in Ages before Ninus; whereby it would follow that Seſoſtris, if he were Vexoris, was more antient then was Ofiris (otherwise Mizraim) a thing altogether unlikely. Certain it is, that after the departure of Israel out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Aſia) till the father-in-law of Solomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, took Gerar, and gave it to his Daughter (as we may read more at large in the holy History of the Bible) after which time, Seſac oppressed Rehobam, and Necho fought passage through the Land of Israel, when he made his Expedition against the Chaldeans. Of King Vaphres, and Necho, it is out of question, that neither of them was the great King Seſoſtris. Of Seſac, it is doubted by some, for as much as he came into Judea with a great Army. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaveth it undecided; unless it be sufficient proof of his own opinion, that he himself placeth Seſoſtris next to Orus, following the Scholesiast Apollonius. But further answer may be made, to shew that they were not one. For, as Justin witnesseth, Seſoſtris, otherwise Vexoris, made War on people far removed, abtaining from his neighbours. Seſac came up purposely against Hiersusalem. Seſoſtris, as Diodorus witnesseth, had but 24000. Horse, Seſac had 60000. Seſoſtris had 8020. Chariots, Seſac 2400. Seſoſtris made his Expedition for no private purpose, but to get a great name; Seſac, as most agree, had no other purpose than to succout Jeroboam, and give him countenance in his new reign; whom he had favoured: even against Solomon: therefore Seſoſtris must needs have reigned whilst Israel abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzheimus collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menis, was next to Orus; because those Historians affirm that he reigned next after the gods; it moveth me nothing. For Ofiris did succeed those fifteen gods; namely, the twelve greater, and three lesser; himself also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menas. Which name, as also Menas, and Menis, were titles of Dignity; though mistaken by some, as proper names. Krentzheimus doth very probably gather, that Menas was Mercurius Ter-maximus, the Hebrew word Meni signifying an Arithmetician; which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Ofiris, who was a great Conqueror, Philosopher, and Benefactor to mankind, by giving good Laws, and teaching profitable Arts. In prowess and great undertakings, Seſoſtris was no whit inferior to Ofiris: For he fought victory not for gain, but honour onely; and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselves to his will and royal disposition, leaving them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soon upon his return, he was endangered by a great Treason, the house in which he was being by his own brother purposely fired; which nevertheless, he is said to have escaped, and to have reigned in all 30. years after which time, he chose rather to die than to live; because he fell blind. Both Herodotus and Diodorus affirm, that Seſoſtris left a Son, whose name was Pheron, or Pherones; who afterwards took the name of Seſoſtris, but was nothing like to his father in glory; for he shortly fell blind. The cause of his blindness, Herodotus attributes to his assaulting the River Nilus with a Javelin; which tale Diodorus having likewise heard, yet reports as a fable, saying, that perhaps he took the disease naturally from his father. How long this man reigned, it is no where expressed; yet, for as much as Orus the second (otherwise Enfris) who succeeded him, began 14. years after that this Seſoſtris had been King, it must needs be that this reigned 14. years at least. That Enfris began not until these 14. years at least were expired, the very account of time from the first Enfris, to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, plainly shews, being almost generally agreed upon, to have been 75. years. That none came between Seſoſtris the second, and Enfris, or Orus the second, it stands only upon probabilities, which are these: After Seſoſtris had reigned some while, he fell blind; after certain years, he recovered his sight, as is said, which may have been true, but is more like to have been a Fable; surely the manner of his recovery, as it is set down, is very fabulous; namely, that by looking upon a woman, or washing his eyes with her water, who had onely known her own husband, he got his sight again. As the time of his reign, before his blindness, and when he was well again (if ever he were) may have taken up a good part of 14. years: so his works, which were great, do much more strongly argue, that his reign was not very short. His works are largely set down by Herodotus and Diodorus; a part of which may seem to have been the finishing of that which which his father had begun, about the channels and fuces of Nilus; whom, I think, he rather frighted (as his father had done) with Spades and Shovels, than with Darts and Javelins; and by his diligent oversight of that work, was like enough to lose both his eye-sight and his peoples love; whom his father had very busily employed in excessive labour about it.

Of Enfris, the first oppressor of the Israelites; and of his successor, Queen Thermutis that took up Moses out of the Water.

And herein (if I may presume to conjecture) Enfris, who was afterwards King, is like to have dealt with him, as Jeroboam did with the Son of Solomon. For that Enfris himself was much addicted to magnificent works, it well appeared by the drudgery wherewith he wearied the children of Israel in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Seſoſtris, as Jeroboam was by Solomon, in the oversight of those businesses, he had good opportunity to work his greatness with the King by industry; and afterward with the people, by incensing them against their new King, as Jeroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at another; unless he have either an equal spirit, or a surer foundation. If moreover he fought to derive all the pain and labour of publick works from the Egyptians to the Israelites: he surely did that to his own people which was very plausible; who (as appears in Exodus) were nothing slack in fulfilling the Kings cruelty. Now, that Orus the second, or Enfris, was the King that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted ten Moneths: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned Writers; who also think that hereupon grew the Fable of Enfris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exod. 1. that the King who knew not Joseph, was a King of a new Family. That Enfris was of a new Family, Reineccius doth shew; who also thinks him an Author of the bloody Edict. Nevertheless, true it is, that Enfris, according to all mens computation, began his reign five years after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more, that the persecution began; which Bunting thinks to have lasted 87. years, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let us therefore consider, besides the blindness of Seſoſtris the second, how great the power of the Regents or Vice-roys in Egypt was; and how great confidence the King did put in them, seeing Joseph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Egypt, and all the Egyptians for bread; giving at the same time, the best of the Land to his own father and brethren for nothing; seeing also that when the Egyptians cried out upon Pharaoh for bread, Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Joseph, what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger born, lately fetched out of prison, a King well able to have governed himself, would give such trust, and sovereign authority; it is not unlikely that a blind Prince should do it to a man of especial reputation. For God often prospers, not onely the good (such as Joseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore, perhaps, the King did (as many have done) resign his Kingdom to him, though his reign was not accounted to have begun till the death of Seſoſtris. But whether Enfris did usurp the Kingdom, or protection of the Land by violence; or whether the blind King resigned it, keeping the Title; or whether Enfris were onely Regent whilst the King lived, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) King himself; it might well be said that Pharaoh's Daughter took up Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel; seeing he both at that time was King in effect, and shortly after, King in deed and title both. It were not absurd for us to say, that the blind King Seſoſtris the second oppressed Israel. But, for as much as it may seem that the wicked Tyrant shewed his evil nature, even when he first arose; I think it more likely, that Enfris did it, using at first the power of a King, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 122. years which passed between the beginning of Seſoſtris his reign, and the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47. being spent; the 75. which remain, are to be accounted to Enfris, or Orus the second, and his children. Enfris himself reigned 30. years, according to Eusebius; whom very many judicious Authors herein approve. After him his daughter, who took Moses out of the Water, is said, by all that I have read, to have reigned 12. years. Her name was Thermutis Pharis, or Authis, according to Cedrenus: Eusebius calls her Acenensis; and out of Artabanus his History, Meris: Joseph calls her both Acencher, and Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario, saith, that she was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the Daughter of Amenoph, the Son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made, and much spoken; for the Scriptures call her not

Pharaoh's

Pharaoh's Son's Daughter, but Pharaoh's Daughter. Amenophis indeed is set next before Eufiris, or Orus the second, by Eusebius and others; but whether he were a King, or only a Regent, I cannot conjecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the ancient Historians, name the Son of Sesoftris, Phoron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis; and his Daughter by the Egyptians called rather the Niece or Grand-child, than the Daughter of Pharaoh, because of the glory of Sesoftris, and the disreputation of his Son. If so, and if that Eufiris, or Orus the second, marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our conjecture strengthened, and then was the both Daughter, Grand-child, and Wife unto Pharaoh; and surviving him, Queen of the Land, 12 years. But if he were Daughter of Orus the second, and sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many think, to whose conjecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seem, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queen Thermutis; and what King it was, under whom Moses was born; and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

He had two brethren; the one was Rathoris, or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is only named by Eusebius; but his lineage and off-spring described by Reineccius. Rathoris, after his sisters death, reigned nine years; after whom Chencres, thought to be his Son, reigned ten years, and then perished in the Red Sea. During the reign of Chencres, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus upon Io; of which History elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Chencres (whom some call Aencheres, but all, or most do stile Sisus, a fighter against God) Acheres reigned 8 years; and then Cherres 15. This descent seems from Father to Son. In the 11. year of Cherres, it is said by Eusebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Egypt, built Momphe. This is an argument of that which otherwife was not unlikely; viz. that Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid upon it, and the destruction of her King and Army in the Red Sea; else could it not have had two reigning in it at once; the latter of whom, or his Posterity, seems to have taken all from Cherres, the Grand-child of Chencres. For whereas Armais is said to have reigned four years after Cherres; and Armesis one after Armais; these two Kings are by Eusebius and others, accounted as one, and his reign said to have been five years. His name is called Armenus, otherwise Danans; and his Pedigree thus described by Reineccius in Hijst. Julia.

Telegonus:

Epaphus:

Lybia, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Eufiris.

Egyptus or Rameffes, who gave name to the Country, having expelled his brother Danans, reigned, and begat Lyncus, married to Hyperminefra.

How it might come to pass, that the Nephews Sons of Epaphus should have occupied the Kingdom after Cherres, it is hard to say; considering that Epaphus himself is reported by Eusebius, to have been born in the time of Chencres. But for as much as the History of Epaphus his birth, is diversly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Danans and Egyptus, otherwise called Armenus and Rameffes, was equally distant from Eufiris, or Orus the second, with Cherres the Grand-child of Chencres. And that the Posterity of Telegonus did marry very young, it appears by the History of these two brethren, Danans and Egyptus; of whom the former had fifty Daughters, the latter fifty Sons; perhaps, or rather questionless, by divers women; yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth; Howsoever it were, the general consent of Writers is, that Armenus, or Danans, did succeed Cherres; and (according to Eusebius, and good Authors approving him) reigned five years. Rameffes followed, who reigned 68 years. This Rameffes, or Egyptus, is that Armesefmiamum, or Armesefmiamus, under whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that follows Mercator, Moses was born; and the cruel Edic made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reign seems to me the chief, if not the only ground of Mercator's opinion. For, whereas the Lord said to Moses, Go, return to Egypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mercator hereupon conceives, that it was one and the same King under whom Moses was born, and under whom he slew the Egyptian at the 40. year of his age; and fled into the wilderness, hels, and there abode for fear: all which circumstances could agree with none, but this Rameffes, who reigned so long; wherefore, desirous rather to hold a true Paradox, than a common Error, he placeth one Alisfragmuthosis (whose name is found in the List of Egyptian Kings, but the time uncertain wherein he reigned) in an Age 112. or 113. years, more antient than others left him in: and so, continuing the Catalogue of his Successors from Themos (whom Eusebius calls Amasis) downwards, with no other variation of the length of each mans reign, than is the difference between Manetho and Eusebius, he finds Moses born under Armesefmiamum, and Israel delivered in the days of his Son Amenophis. The very name of Alisfragmuthosis seems to him with little alteration to sound like Phararater, of which name one was thought to have flourished, either as a King, or a wife Man, about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmuthosis to Phragmuthosis, Pharmuthosis, or Phararater, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent

Learning and Industry; and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable Works: yet my assent herein is with-held from him by these Reasons. First, I see all other Writers agree, that Chencres was King, who was drowned in the Red Sea. Secondly, the place, Exod. 4. All are dead, &c. may better be understood of Eufiris, and all his children, than of one King alone. Thirdly, S. Cyril in his first Book against Julian the Apostate, saith, that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120. years old, which was this Armesefmiamum, being then King of Egypt. After Rameffes, Amenophis reigned 19. years; who is thought by Mercator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that perished in the Red Sea; of which our Opinion being already laid open, I think it most expedient to refer the Kings ensuing to their own times (which a Chronological Table shall lay open) and here to speak of that great deliverance of Israel out of Egypt; which for many great considerations depending thereupon, we may not lightly over-pass.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moses Birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

True it is, that the History itself is generally and well known; yet concerning the time of Moses his Birth, who was the excellent and famous Instrument of this, and other great Works of the Higheft, the different opinions are very near as many as the men that have written of that Argument.

L. Vrius, in his Annotations upon S. Augustine, cites very many of their conjectures: as that of Porphyrio out of Sanchoiatis, that Moses lived in the time of Semiramis: But, if he did mean the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit; for besides that the same is contrary to all Stories divine and humane; while that Semiramis lived, the commanded Syria, and all the parts the parts thereof absolutely; neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while she ruled, in verum natura.

A second Opinion he remembreth out of Apion, taken from Ptolemy, a Priest of Mendes, who saith, that Moses was born while Inachus did rule the Argives, and Ameser in Egypt.

The third Opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greek History, the first Book; that Moses was born while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Affricus, who, though he cite some Authorities, that Moses lived after the Trojan war, is himself of opinion, that Moses was far more antient, proving it by many arguments.

Fifthly, he setteth down the testimony of Nimitho the Philosopher, who took Moses and Moses to be one; confirming the same out of Artapanus, who confesseth that Moses was called Mansu by the Grecians; and who farther delivereth, that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermuthis, the Daughter of Egypt; the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus)

Thermothcs. Enphibius also affirmeth, that by Eupolemus, in his first Book, de Bono, Moses, vir Deo conjunctissimus, is called Museus Judeorum, Enphibius, in his Chronology, finds that Moses was born while Amenophis ruled Egypt. The ancient Mamehon calls that Pharaoh, which lived at Moses birth, Thammosis, or Thomosis: the same, perchance, which Apion the Grammarian will have to be Amosis, and else-where Amenophis, the father of Sethosis: to whom Lysimachus, and Cornelius Tacitus, gave the name of Bocchoris. To me it seems most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Spherus, or Iphereus, governed Affria; Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Crisius the Argives; that then (Sesoftris the second ruling in Egypt) Moses was born. For, if we believe Saint Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Egypt, Eduxit Moses ex Aegypto populum Dei novissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensium Regis; Moses (saith he) led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrops time, King of the Athenians. In this sort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Egypt best proved, Saint Augustine affirms (as before remembered) that Moses was born, Saphrus governing Affria; and that he left Egypt about the end of Cecrops time. Now, Saphrus ruled twenty years; his successor Mamehus thirty years; Spartetus after him forty years: in whose fourth year Cecrops began to govern in Attica: Ascatades followed Spartetus, and held the Empire one and forty years. So as Moses being born while Saphrus ruled Affria; Orthopolis Sicyonia, and Crisius Argos (for these three Kings lived at once at his birth, Saint Augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Egypt) it will follow, that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth year of the Affrian Saphrus; for take one year remaining of twenty (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which add the thirty years of Mamehus, and the forty years of Spartetus, these make seventy one, with which there were wasted three years of Cecrops his fifty years: then take nine years out of the reign of Ascatades, who was Spartetus successor, those nine years added to seventy one, make eighty, at which age Moses left Egypt; and add these nine years to the three years of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remain but four years of Cecrops his fifty, and so it falleth right with S. Augustine's words, affirming, that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Egypt.

Now, the time in which the Hebrews were oppressed in Egypt, seemeth to have had beginning some eight or nine years before the birth of Moses, and fifty four years, or rather more, after Joseph; between whose death, and the birth of Moses, there were consumed sixty four years, some of which time, and eighty years after, they lived in great servitude and misery. For, as it is written in Exodus: They set task-masters over them, to keep them under with burdens; and they built the Cities, Pithom and Rameses, &c. And by cruelty, they caused the children of Israel to serve, and made them weary of their liver, by sore labour in Clay and Brick, and in all work of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid upon them by a mastering power, and strong hand, they endured to the time by the will-dome of God appointed; even from fifty four years, or not much more, after the death of Joseph, who left the World when when it had lasted 2370. to the eighteenth year of Moses, and until he wrought his miracles in the field of Zaan, which he performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Codaman, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliver of Egypt, may the better be understood, I think it necessary to speak a few words of the principal place therein named in this Discourse.

§. II.

Of divers Cities and Places in Egypt, mentioned in this Story, or else-where in the Scriptures.

This City, which the Hebrews call Zaan, was built seven years after Herbon. Ezekiel calleth it Taphnes, and so doth Hieronymus the Septuagint, Tanakis, Josephus, Phisade, after the name of an Egyptian Queen; Antoninus gives it the name of Thamnis; Josephus, Thamnis; and William Tyrtius, Tapius. It adjoyneth to the Land of Gosen, and is the same, wherein Hieronymus the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Egyptian and Jewish Idolatry.

Zaan, or Taphnes, was, in Moses time, the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which their Rharaohs then commonly resided; and not unlikely to be the same City, where Abraham in his time found him, but Enphibius out of Artapanus affirmeth, that Abraham did read Astronomy in Heliopolis, or On, to Pharaoh King of Egypt. Alex. Polyhistor, out of Eupolemus, hath in otherwise, saying, that Abraham instructed the Egyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Eusebius citeth. Edition, for Zaan, write Heliopolis. Pagnin, Vatablus, Junius, and our English call it On; and Ptoleme, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, toward the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nilus, falling into the Sea at Pelusijs. And it may be, that Heliopolis, to the South of the River Trojan, was the same which Vatablus and our English call Aven. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certain knowledge; the same which Pomp. Mela and Plinie call Solk oppidum; Tyris in the Holy Warr, Malbec; the Arabians, Bahalbeth; and Simon Sethi, Fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Potiphar Priest, or Prince, whose Daughter Joseph married. In the Territory adjoining, Jacob inhabited, while he lived in Egypt. In the confines of this City, Onias, the High Priest of the Jews, built a Temple, dedicated to the Eternal God; not much inferior to that of Hierusalem (Ptolemy Philopater, then governing in Egypt) which stood in the time of Vespassian, 333. years after the foundation by Onias, whom Josephus falsely reporteth herein, to have fulfilled a Prophecy of Ejays, Chap. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terre Egypti; In that day shall the Altar of the Lord be in the midst of the Land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes, at the time of the building tyrannizing over the Jews, gave the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Egypt. Lastly, there it was that our Saviour Christ Jesus remained, while Joseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: near which (saith Brochard) the Fountain is still found, called Jesus Well, whose streams do afterward water the Gardens of Bethaniam, no where else found in Egypt. And here- of see more in Brochard, in his Description of Egypt.

There is also in that City of Noph, remembered by Ejays and Ezekiel, the same which Hosea the Prophet calleth Moph; which later name it took from a Mountain adjoining, so called; which Mountain Herodotus remembereth. And this is that great City, which was called Memphe; and so the Septuagint write it. It is known to the Arabians by the name of Alazar. The Chaldeans name it Alchabyr; and Tudalensis, Atiarain.

Pelusium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our English, write Sinis, the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the same with Damietta, as Gul. Tyrinus witnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelusium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrinus) quod olim dicta est Pelusium; Belbeis that in times past was called Pelusium.

The City of No, the Septuagint call Diof, polis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Hierow converts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Eubasus (for so Hierome and Zeigler do write it) is the same which the Hebrews call Piseeth.

To make the Story more perceivable, I have added a Description of the Land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembered in the Scripture: as of Taphnes, or Zaan, Heliopolis, or Bethemes, Balsophon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Deserts of Arabia the Story. For all Story, without the knowledge of the places wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure, so it no way enricheth the knowledge and understanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serve to retain, what we read, in our memories, so well as these Pictures and Descriptions do. In which respect I am driven to digress in many places, and to interpose some such Discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent; taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arias Montanus; who, in his Preface to the Story of the Holy Land, hath these words: Si enim abque locorum observatione res gestae narrentur, aut sine Topographia cognitio Historie legantur, adeo confusi atque perturbata erunt omnia, ut ex his nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit; If narration (saith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the observation of the places wherein they were done; or if Histories be read without Topographical knowledge; all things will appear so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby understand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficulty.

§. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young children in Egypt; and of Moses his preservation and Education.

But to return to the Story it self. It appeareth, that notwithstanding the labour and slavery which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: in so much as Pharaoh, considering the danger of discontented poverty, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perilous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Devil, resolved to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrews, as soon as they should be born. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thura, women the most famous and expert amongst them, Quæ præerant (saith Comeſtor) multitudinis obſtrictrici, who had command given them over all Mid-wives; by whom (as it ſeemeth) he gave order to all the reſt for the execution of his Edict. For, to have called all the Mid-wives of Egypt together, had been a ſtrange Parliament. Now, whether theſe two (before named) were of the Hebrews, or of the Egyptians, it is diſputed. S. Auguſtine calls them Hebrews, becauſe it is written Exodus 1. The King of Egypt commanded the Mid-wives of the Hebrew women, &c. But Joſephus, Abulenſis, and Pererius believe them to be Egyptians. Whoſoever they were, when it pleaſed God to fruſtrate the execution of that ſecret murder, to the end the World might witneſs both the wickedneſs of the Egyptians, and the juſt cauſe, thereby made manifeſt, of his future indignation and revenge: Pharaoh finding theſe Women filled with piety, and the fear of God, commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publicly, or howſoever, to deſtroy all the male Hebrew children born within his Dominions.

Now, beſides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrews, the greateſt part of whom he might have aſſured, by aſſording them the juſtice which every King oweth to his vallaſs, and the reſt he might have employed, or ſent away, at his pleaſure; Joſephus giveth another cauſe of his rage againſt them, namely, That it was prophetically delivered him by an Egyptian Prieſt, that among the Hebrews there ſhould be born a child, who growing to manſeſtate, ſhould become a plague and terror to his whole Nation. To prevent which (and preſuming that he could reſiſt the Ordinance of God, by a mean, contrary to the Laws of Heaven and of Nature) he ſtretched out his bloody and mercileſs hand to the execution of his former intent. The ſame prevention Herod long after practiſed, when fearing the ſpiritual Kingdom of Chriſt, as if it ſhould have been temporal, he cauſed all the male children at that time born, to be ſlaughtered. And that Pharaoh had ſome kind of foreknowledge of the future ſucceſs, it may be gathered by his own words, In the tenth Verſe of the fifth of Exodus: Come, let us work wiſely with them, leſt they multiply; and it comes to paſs, that if there be Warr, they join themſelves alſo unto our enemies, and fight againſt us, and get them out of the Land. But we ſee, and time hath told it us from the beginning, how God derideth the wiſ-

dom of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they rely on the inventions of their own moſt feeble, and altogether darkened, underſtanding. For even by the hands of the dearly beloved daughter of this Tyrant, was that great Prophet and Miniſter of Gods marvellous works taken out of Nilus, being thereinto turned off, in an Ark of Reeds, a ſucking and powerleſs Infant. And this Princeſs having beheld the child his form and beauty, though but yet in the blouth, ſo pierced her compaſſion, as he did not onely preſerve it, and cauſe it to be ſoſtered; but commanded that it ſhould be eſteemed as her own, and with equal care to the Son of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deed, ſhe called the child Moſes, as it were, extraſtus, or ereptus, taken out, to wit, out of the Water; or after Joſephus and Glycas, Moy, a voice expreſſing Water, and Hiſer, as much as to ſay, as that which is drawn out of Water, or thence taken. Clement Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moſes was circumciſed before he was put into the Ark of Reeds, and that Amram his father had named him Joachin. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care, and at the charge, of Pharaohs Daughter, and by men of the moſt underſtanding, taught and inſtructed: Quem regio more educavit, præſeſtis ei ſapientibus Aegyptiorum Magiſtris, à quibus erudiretur, ſaith Baſil, unto whom ſhe gave Princely education, appointing over him wiſe Maſters of the Egyptians for his inſtructers. Thereby (ſay Joſephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians; which alſo the Martyr Stephen in the ſeventh of the Acts confirmeth. And Moſes was learned in all the wiſdom of the Egyptians. Which Wiſdom or Sapience, ſuch as it was, or at leaſt ſo much thereof as Six. Senenſis hath gathered, we have added, between the death of Moſes, and the reign of Joſua.

§. IV.

Of Moſes his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certain ancient Hiſtorians of his war in Aethiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his judgment of his Paſtoral life; and that of Pererius of the Books of Genesis and Job.

When Moſes was grown to manſeſtate, Joſephus and Eusebius, out of Artapanus, tell us of ten years Warr that he made againſt the Aethiopians; of the beſieging of Seba, afterward, by Cambyſes, called Meroe; and how he recovered the City by the fa-your of Tharbis, a Daughter of Ethiopia, whom he took to Wife. So hath Comestor a pretty tale of Moses, how after the end of that War, Tharbis resisting his return into Egypt, Moses, most skilful in Astronomy, caused two Images to be engraven in two precious Stones, whereof the one increased memory; the other caused forgetfulness: These he let in two Rings; whereof he gave the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his Wife Tharbis, reserving the other of memory for himself; which Ring of forgetfulness, after she had a while worn, she began to neglect the love she bare her Husband; and so Moses, without danger, returned into Egypt. But leaving these fables to the Authours of them: It is true, that about the fortieth year of Moses age, when he beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrews, moved by compassion, in respect of his brother, and stirred up by disdain against the other, in the contention he slew the Egyptian. Soon after which fact, finding a disposition in some of his own Nation to accuse him, for whose defence, he had thus greatly endangered his own life: by the ordinance and advice of God, whose chosen servant he was, he fled into Arabia Petrea, the next bordering Countrey to Egypt, where wandering all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place unknown unto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times, were the irreconcilable enemies of the Hebrews: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly means) to make the watering of a few sheep, and the assisting of the Daughter of Raguel the Madianite, an occasion whereby to provide him a Wife of one of those, and a father-in-law, that sustained him in a Countrey nearest Egypt, fittest to return from necessary to be known, because inter-jacent between Egypt and Judah, through which he was to lead the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented best served. And lastly, where the glory of the world shined least, amidst mountainous Deserts, there the glory of God, which shineth most, covered him over; and appeared unto him, not finding him as a King's Son, nor an adopted child of great Pharaoh's Daughter, but as a meek and humble Shepherd, sitting at a mountains foot, a keeper and commander of those poor Beasts, which in that part of Arabia near Madian, he consumed 40. years; and though (as Philo in the Story of Moses observeth) he did not neglect the care of those flocks, committed to his charge; that he excelled all others in that Pastoral knowledge; yet in that solitary Desert, he enjoyed himself; and being separate from the preas of the world, and the troublesome affairs thereof, he gave himself to contemplation, and to make perfect in himself all those knowledges, whereof his younger years had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Authour also judging that his Pastoral life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principality, which he afterward obtained. Eft enim (saith Plato) ars Pastoralis, quasi praeludium ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, gregis manifestissimi. Quem admodum bellioſa ingenia preæxerunt ſe in venationibus, experientia in ſeris, quæ poſtea in militia, & bello perfectura ſunt; hunc præbentibus materiis exercitiis, tam bellioſam pacis tempore. The art of keeping ſheep is, as it were, an introductory exerciſe unto a Kingdom, namely, the rules over men, the moſt gentle ſtock: even as warlike natures do before-hand exerciſe themſelves in hunting, praſtiſing on wild beaſts thoſe things which after they will accompliſh in war: ſo theſe brave beaſts affording matter, whereunto to train themſelves, both in times of war and of peace. But the government of gentle cattle, hath a kind of reſemblance unto a Kingly rule over ſubjects; therefore Kings are ſometimes ſhepherds of the people; not in way of reproach, but for their honour.

That Moses, in the time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Book of Job, as Pererius ſuppoſeth, I cannot judge of it, becauſe it is thought, that Job was at that time living. Neither dare I ſubſcribe to Pererius opinion, That Moses, while he lived in that part of Arabia, wrote the Book of Genesis; although I cannot deny the reaſon of Pererius conjecture. That by the example of Job's patience he might ſtrengthen the oppreſſed Hebrews; and by the promiſes of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, put them in aſſurance of their delivery from the Egyptian ſlavery; and of the Land of reſt, add plenty, promiſed.

Of his calling back into Egypt by the Angel of God, and the marvels and wonders which he performed, thereby to perſwade Pharaoh, that he was the miſterger of the moſt High, the particulars are written in the firſt fourteen Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needleſs. But for the firſt, it is to be noted, that when Moses deſired to be taught of God, by what name he ſhould make him known, and by whom he was ſent; he

But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught of God, by what name he should make him known, and by whom he was sent; he

he received from God so much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and ever-being Nature. Out of which he delivered him in the first part of his Answer; a name to be considered of by the wife; and in his second, to be understood by all. For, there is nothing that is, or hath being of it self, but the Eternal: which truly is, which is above all, which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed every moment; their substance wasteth, and is repaired by nutriment; never continuing at one stay, nor being the same so long as while one may say, Now. Likewise, whatsoever is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same, in every shortest piece of time suffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in lone state. *Una est Dei, & sola natura quæ vult esse: id enim quod subsistit, non habet aliud, sed sum est. Cætera quæ creata sunt, easiam videntur esse, non sunt; quia aliquando non fuerunt, & potest transire non esse, quod non sinit; ita ut the one and only nature of God, which truly is: for he hath his being of himself, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seem to be, yet they are not; for sometimes they were not; and that which hath not been, may again want being. And with this, in respect of the divine Nature, the saying of Zeno: Eleates excellently agreeth: Tota rerum natura umbra est, aut inanis, aut fallax; The whole nature of things is but a shadow, either empty or deceitfull: in comparison of whom (saith Ezay) all Nations are nothing, less than nothing, and meer vanity.*

Of the ten Plagues wherewith the Egyptians were stricken, the first was by changing the Rivers into blood; God punishing them by those waters; into which their forefathers had thrown; and in which they had drowned, the innocent children of the Hebrews. To which this place of the Revelation may be fitly applied: And I heard the Angel of the water say; Lord, thou art just, who art, and which wast; and holy, because thou hast judged these things; for they shed the blood of thy Saints and Prophets, and therefore hast thou given them blood to drink.

The rest of the Plagues by Frogs, Lice, Flies, or Stinging Walps, by the death of their Cattel; by leprous Scabs; by Hail and Fire; by Grasshoppers; by Darknes; after which, Pharaoh forbid Moses his presence: moved, the hardened heart of the unbelieving King, no longer than the pain and peril lasted; till such time as his own first-born, and the first-born of all his Nation perished. He then, while he feared his own life (a time wherein we remember God perforce) stood upon no condition; whereas before, he first yielded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women, and children; reserving their bestial; but he was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not onely depart with all their own, but with a part of the Silver, Gold, and Jewels of his own people: of which (the fear being past) he suddenly repented him, as his pursuit after them proved. For, when every one of the Hebrews had (according to direction from Moses received) slain a Lamb, without spot or blemish, for the Passover (a Sacrament of the most clean and unspotted Saviour) and with the blood thereof of coloured the post and lintern of the doors; the Angel of God in the night smote every first-born of Egypt, from the Son of the King, to that of the Beggar and Slave: the children of the Israelites excepted. At which terrible judgment of God, Pharaoh being more than ever amazed, yielded, as before is said, to their departure. The Egyptians (saith Epiphanius) did, in after-times, imitate this colouring with blood, which the Israelites used after the Passover; ascribing an exceeding virtue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not onely mark their Sheep and Cattel, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preserve them from lightning, and other harms.

§. V.

Of Pharaoh's pursuit of the Israelites; and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so far as Succoth.

Now, when the people were removed, and on their way (his heart being hardened by God) he bethought him as well of the honour lost, as of the shame remaining after so many Calamities and Plagues, in suffering them to depart with the spoils of his people; and in despite of himself: And having before this time great Companies of Soldiers in readiness, he consulted with himself; what way the Israelites were like to take. He knew that the shortest and fairest passage was through the Countrey of the Philistines. But because these people were very strong, and a warlike Nation, and (in all probability) of his Allies, he suspected that Moses meant to find some other out-let, to wit, through the Defart of Etham; and there, because the Countrey was exceeding mountainous, and of hard access, and that Moses was pestered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, he thought it impossible for the Israelites to escape him that that way. In the mean while, having gathered together all the Chariots of Egypt, and six hundred of his own, and Captains over them; he determined to set upon them in the plains of Gosen, which way soever they turned themselves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharp hooks on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kind of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Britains used against the Romans, while they made the War for the conquest of this Land. Of this Army of Pharaoh, Josephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 30000. Horse, and 20000. Foot; which, were it true, then it cannot be doubted, but that Pharaoh intended long before to assail the Hebrews at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as he had prepared an Army to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, he doubted two things, either that the Hebrews might join themselves to his enemies within the Land; or being so multiplied, as they were, might leave his service, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieved him withall, enforced him, at this time, to give an assent to their departure; perchance fore-ruling his intent. But were it otherwise, and Josephus partial in this affair, yet, by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Egypt, which could not be done in haste. For Moses made but three days march, ere Pharaoh was at his heels; and yet the last day, he went on, 16. miles: which in so hot a Countrey, and to drive their Cattel and Sheep with them, pestered with a world of Women and Children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerfull Enemy at hand. Now, as Moses well knew that he went out with a mighty hand, and that God guided his understanding in all his enterprises; so he lay not still in the ditch, crying for help, but using the understanding which God had given him, he left nothing unperformed becoming a wise man, and a valiant and skillfull Conductor; as by all his actions and counsels, from this day to his death, well appeared.

When Moses perceived that Pharaoh was enraged against him, and commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his preference: after that he had warned Israel of the Passover, he appointed a general Assembly, or Rendez-vow of all the Hebrews at Ramefes, in the Territory of Gosen; a City standing indifferent to receive from all parts of the Countrey, the dispersed Hebrews; and gave commandment, that every Family should bring with them such store as they had of Dough, and Pulse, not staying to make it into Bread; knowing then that Pharaoh was on foot, and on his way towards them. Which done, and having considered the great strength of Pharaoh's Horse-men and Chariots, of which kind of defence Moses was utterly unprovided (though, as it is written, the Israelites went up armed) he marched from Ramefes East-ward, towards the Defarts of Etham, and encamped at Sychoth; which he performed on the fifteenth day of the Month Abis, which Month, from thence time forward, they were commanded to account as the first Month of the year. Whether in former times they had been accustomed to begin their year in some other Month, following the manner of the Egyptians, and were now re-called by Moses to the rule of their fore-fathers, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that they had, and retained another beginning of their Politick year; which was not now abrogated, but rather, by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in use. Wherefore in referring things done, or happening among them, unto the beginning, middle, or ending of the year; that distinction of the Sacred and the Politick year is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of days in every Month, and the whole form of their year, like enough it is, that Moses himself in forty years space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was given in trust; but that any rule of framing their Kalender was made publick, before the captivity of Babylon, I do not find. Now, because time and motion begin together, it will not, I think, be any great breach of order, to shew here, at their first setting forth, what was the form of the Hebrew year; with the difference between them and other Nations, in ordering the account of time.

§. VI.

§. VI.

Of the Solary and Lunary years; and how they are reconciled; with the form of the Hebrew year, and their manner of intercalation.

The Hebrew Moneths are thus named.

The First Moneth, Nisan, or Abib.	1. March.
II. Jar, or Iar, Zio, or Zin.	2. April.
III. Sivan, or Sivan, or Siban.	3. May.
IV. Tamuz.	4. June.
V. Ab.	5. July.
VI. Ebul.	6. August.
VII. Elul, or Ethauim, or Ethauim.	7. September.
VIII. Marpesan, or Marpesan, or Mar.	8. October.
IX. Chisleu, or Caphen.	9. November.
X. Tebeth, or Thebeth.	10. December.
XI. Sebeth, or Sabath.	11. January.
XII. Adar, and Ve Adar.	12. February.

Ve Adar, was an intercalary Moneth, added some years into the other twelve, to make the Solary and Lunary year agree; which (besides the general inconvenience that would otherwise have risen, by casting the Moneths of Summer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrews, because of the divine Precept For God appointed especial Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a Moneth of the year, and withall on a set day, both of the Moon; and of the Moneth: as the Feast of the First-fruits; the new Moons, and the like; which could not have been kept, if either the day of the Moon had fallen in some other part of the Moneth, or the Moneth it self been found far distant from his place in the season of the year.

Other Nations, the better to observe their Solemnities in the due time; and to ascertain all reckonings and remembrances (which is the principal commodity of time that is, the measure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their years unequal, by adding sometimes, and sometimes abating one or more days; as the error committed in foregoing years required. The error grew at first, by not knowing what number of days made up a complete year. For though by the continual course of the Sun, causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plain enough, even to the most savage of all people, when a year hath passed over them; yet the necessity of ordinary occurrences, that are to be numbered by a shorter tally, makes this long measure of whole years insufficient for the smaller sort of more daily affairs. Therefore men observed the Monthly conspicuous revolution of the Moon, by which they divided the year into twelve parts, subdividing the Moneth into 29. days and nights, and those again into their quarters and hours. But as the marks of time are sensibly and easily discerned; so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the understanding. Twelve revolutions of the Moon, containing less time by 11. days, or thereabout, than the yearly course of the Sun through the Zodiak, in the space of sixteen years, every Moneth was found in the quite contrary part of the year, to that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to add some days to the year, making it to consist of twelve Moneths; and as many days more, as they thought would make the courses of the Sun and Moon to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the Sun determine his yearly revolution by any set number of whole days; neither did the Moon change always at one hour; but the very minutes and lesser fractions were to be observed by him, that would seek to reduce their motions (which motions also were not still alike) into any certain rule.

Here say much Wisdom; and deep Art; which could not soon be brought to perfection. Yet, as making an estimate at himself, the Athenians held the year to contain three hundred and sixty days; whereas most of the Greeks concurred with them. As three hundred and sixty days filled up the Grecian year (besides many collateral proofs) it is manifest by that which Ptolemy erected in the honour of Demetrius Phalereus, which were (saith he) 360; whilst as yet the year exceeded not that number of days. By this account, neither did any certain age of the Moon begin or end their Moneths; neither could their Moneths continue many years in their own places; but must needs be shifted by little and little, from Winter to Summer; and from Summer to Winter; as the days forgotten to be inserted into the Almanack by men, but not forgotten by the superiour bodies in their courses; should occupy their own rooms in their due time. Now, because the solemnity of the Olympian games was to be held at the full Moon; and withall, on the fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombion (which an Astrologer in a manner to our June) they were careful to take order, that this Moneth might ever begin with the new Moon; which they effected by adding some two days to the last Moneth of every year; those games being held once in four years. This intercalation sufficed not to make the matter even; which caused them sometimes to omit one day in the fourth year, which was the second of the Moneth Bedromion (agreeing nearly with our August) sometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to insert another for it in their fourth Lunary year, accounting by the Moon, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their Moneth of June would every year have grown colder and colder, had they not sought to keep all upright, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth year, one whole Moneth, which they called the second Epiodeon, or December; which was the device of Harpalus, who also taught them to make one Month of 29. days, another of 30. days, & so successively through the whole year. Thus, with much labour, they kept their year, as near as they could, unto the high way of the Planets; but these marks, which they observed, were found at length to be deceitful guides. For it was not possible so to fashion this eighth years intercalation, that it should not deceive them in 11. hours and 18. minutes at the least, or some ways in 34. hours and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences, would in few Ages, have bred much confusion. The first that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who, not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth years intercalation, devised a Cycle of 19. years, wherein the Moon, having 235. times run out her circuit, met with the Sun in the same place, & on the same day of the year; as in the 19. year before past she had done. This invention of Meton, was entertained with great applause, and passing from Greece to Rome, was there inserted into the Kalender in Golden Letters, being called, The Golden Number, which name it retaineth unto this day. Hereby were avoided the great and uncertain intercalations that formerly had been used; for by the intercalation of seven Months, in the 19. years, all was so even, that no sensible difference could be found. Yet that error which in one year could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moons anticipating in one Cycle 7. hours, and some minutes, of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus devised a new Cycle, containing four of Metons; that is to say, 76. years; and afterwards, Hipparchus, a noble Astrologer, framed another, containing four of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some error in the former Observations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalender, was that which Julius Caesar made, who, by advice of the best Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courses of those heavenly bodies, reduced the year unto the form which is now in use with us, containing 365. days and 6. hours, which hours in four years, make up one whole day, that is intercalated every fourth year, the 24. of February. The correction of the Julian year by Pope Gregory the 13. Anno Dom. 1582. is not as yet entertained by general consent; it was indeed but as a Note added unto the Work of Caesar; yet a Note of great importance. For whereas it was observed, that the Sun, which at the time of the Nicene Council, Anno Dom. 234. entered the Aequinoctial on the 21. day of March, was in the year 1582. ten days sooner found, in that time Pope Gregory strook out of the Kalender ten days, following the 4. of October; so that in stead of the fifth day, was written the fifteenth; by which means the movable Feasts depending on the Sun's entrance into Aries, were again celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene Council they had been. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the Council of Trent ordained, that from thence forward, in every hundred year, the Leap-day should be omitted, excepting still the fourth hundred; because the Sun doth not in his yearly course, take up full fix hours above the 365. days, but falleth so many minutes, as in 400. years, make about three whole days.

But the Cycle of 29. years, which the Hebrews used, was such as neither did need any nice curiosity of hours, minutes, and other lesser fractions to help it; neither did in summing up the days of the whole year, neglect the days of the Moon, confounding one Month with another. For with them it fell out, so that always the Kalends, or first day of the Moneth, was at the new Moon; and because that day was Festival, they were very careful, as well to observe the thort year of the Moon, passing through all the 12. Signs in one Moneth, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gave it to Nisan, their first Moneth, which is about our March, or April, 30. days; to Jar, their second Moneth 29. days; and so successively 30. to one, 29. to another. Hereby it came to pass, that every two Moneths of theirs contain'd somewhat evenly two revolutions of the Moon, allowing 29. days 12. hours, and odd minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous, or Epact days; which made up seven Moneths in 19. years; to fix of which seven were commonly given 30. days, to one of them 29. days, or otherwise, as was found requisite. Their common year (as appeareth by the several days days of each Moneth) contained 354 days, which fall of the year, wherein the Sun finisheth his course, 11. whole days, with some fractions of time. But these days, and other broken pieces, howsoever they were neglected in one year, yet in the Cycle of 19. years, were so disposed of by convenient intercalations, that still at the end of the Cycle, both the Sun and Moon, were found on the same day of the year, Moneth, and week, year, commonly on the same hour of the day, where they had been at the beginning of its 19. years before.

Significat.
Hic lib. 3.
cap. 1.

Divers have diversly set down the forms of the Hebrew year, with the manner of their intercalations. Significat tells us, that every second year, they did add a Moneth of 29. days; every fourth year a Moneth of 30. in regard of 11. days and a half wanting in 12. Months to fill a year of the Sun. But here in Significat was very much deceived. For the Moon doth never finish her course in 12. or 29. days; and therefore to have added so many days to the end of the year, had been the way to change the fashion of all the Months in the years following, which could not have begun, as they ought, with the new Moon. Genebrard saith, that every third year, or second year, as need required, they did intercalate one Moneth, adding it at the years end unto the other 12. This I believe to have been true; but in which of the years the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) me thinks they do not probably deliver, who keep all far from evenness, until the very last of the 19. years. For (to omit such as are grossly) some there are who say, that after three years, when besides the days spent in 36. courses of the Moon, 33. days are left remaining, that is, 11. days of each year; then did the Hebrews add a Moneth of 30. days; keeping three days, as were, in plussage unto the next account. The like say they, was done at the end of the fifth year; at which time, besides the intercalary Moneth, remained six days, namely, three surmounting that Moneth, and the Ephat of three years, besides the three formerly reserved. Thus they go on to the 18. year; at which time they have 18. days in hand: all which, with the Ephat of the 19. year, make up a Moneth of 29. days, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle, makes all even.

Whether this were the practice, I cannot affirm nor deny; yet surely it must needs have bred a great confusion, if in the 18. year every Moneth were removed from his own place by the distance of 48. days, that is, half a quarter of a year and more; which inconvenience, by such a reckoning, was unavoidable. Wherefore I prefer the common opinion, which prevents such dislocation of the Months, by setting down a more convenient way of intercalation in the 8. year. For the 6. days remaining after the two former intercalations made in the third and sixth years, added unto the 22. days arising out of the Ephat of the 7. and 8. years, do easily serve to make up a Moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the year following; and this borrowing of two days is so far from causing any disorder, that indeed it helps to make the year ensuing vary the less from the proper season of every Moneth. This may suffice to be spoken of the Hebrew Months and years, by which they guided their accounts.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea; and of the divers ways leading out of Egypt.

FROM Succoth, in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desert of Etham, to recover the Mountain foot, by the edge of ophar Wilderness, though he intended nothing less than to go out of that way, of all other the nearest. But being assured of the multitude of Hosts, men and armed Chariots that followed him, he kept himself from being encompassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. As Etham lay west but one night, and then he reflected back from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance between it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbore to enter Arabia, being then in sight thereof, is seemeth to proceed from three respects: the first two, natural, the third, divine. For, pharaoh being then at hand, and having received intelligence of the way which Moses took, persuaded himself, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of above a Million, if not of two Millions of Souls (for it is written, Exod. the 12. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly pass over those Desert and high Mountains with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, but that at the very entrance of that fastness he should have overtaken them, and destroyed the greatest number of them. For these his own words, They are tangled in the Land, the Wilderness hath shut them in, do shew his hopes and intents; which Moses, by turning another way, did frustrate. Secondly, Moses, by offering to enter Arabia that way,

It is probable all that Egyptian multitude brought by the Wilderness, knowing of the way to the Red Sea, did follow him for at his departure

way, drew Pharaoh toward the East-side of the Land of Gosen, or Ramesses: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reason of the roughness of the way; and howsoever, yet while the Hebrews kept the Mountain foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the over-bearing violence both of Horses and Chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the All-powerfull God was such, by whose Spirit, onely wise, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leave the glory of his deliverance and victory to Almighty God than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000 men, to cast the success upon his own understanding, wise conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Ribaheroth, sixteen miles distant, and late down between two ledges of Mountains adjoining to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountains of Etham on the North, and Baahaphon towards the South; the same which Orosius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple, dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagius noteth, the word so compounded, is as much to say, as, Dominus specula; five custodie; Lord of the watch-tower. For the Egyptians believed, or at least made their slaves believe, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idol would both arrest them, and force them to return to their Lords and Masters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turns. Egyptii dii secundi; The Egyptians were fruitful in gods, saith S. Hierom. But Moses, who encamped at the foot of this Mountain with a million of Souls, or, as others conceive, with two millions, found this Lord of the Watch-tower allceep, or out of countenance.

Now, these two passages, leading out of Egypt into Arabia upon the firm Land, Moses refused, as well that of Pelusium and Casiothe, the fairest and shortest of all other, in respect of Judaea, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembered, and took the way by the Valley of Ribaheroth, between the Mountains, which made a straight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made so great speed with his Horse-men and Chariots, as he gave the Hebrews no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but got sight of them, and they of him, even at the very brink and wath of the Sea; in so much as the Hebrews being terrified with Pharaoh's sudden approach, began to despair, and to mutiny, at that time when it behooved them most to have taken courage for their own defence; laying it to Moses charge, that themselves foresaw those perils in which they were wrapped. And fear, which, saith the Book of Wisdom, is the betraying of those succours; which reason offereth, made them both despair in God's former Promises, and to be forgetfull of their own strength and multitudes. Chap. 17.

§. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red Sea; and of the Red Sea it self.

BUT Moses, who feared nothing but God himself, perswaded them to be confident in his goodness, who hath never abandoned those, that assuredly trusted in him; using this comfortable and resolved speech: Fear not, &c. for the Egyptians whom ye have seen this day, ye shall never see them again. The Lord shall fight for you. After which, Moses called on God for succour, received encouragement, and commandment to go on, in these words; Wherefore cryest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forwards, and lift thou up thy Rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it, and let the children of Israel go on dry ground through the midst of the Sea. Moses obeying the voice of God, in the dark of the night, finding the sands uncovered, past on towards the other side and coast of Arabia; two parts of the night being spent ere he entered the Foord, which it pleased God by a forcible Eastern Wind, and by Moses Rod, to prepare.

Pharaoh followed him even at the heels, finding the same dry ground which Moses trod on. Therefore, as it is written: The Angel of God which went before the Host of Israel, removed, and went behind them; also the Pillar of the cloud went from before them, and stood behind them; which is, that it pleased God therein, either by his immediate power, or by the ministry of his Angel, to interpose his defence between the Hebrews and their Enemies; to the end that the Egyptians might hereby be blinded, in such sort, as they could not pursue Israel with any harmful speed. But in the morning-watch, Moses seized the other bank of Arabia side; and Pharaoh (as the dawn of the day began to enlighten the obscure air) finding a beginning of the Sea's return, halted himself towards his own Coast: But Moses stretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is, the Sea, moved by the power of God, ran back towards the Land with unresistible fury and swiftness, and overwhelmed the whole Army of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For, it is written, that God took off their Chariot wheels, that that is, when the waters began to cover the lands, the Egyptians being stricken with fear of death, ran one athwart another, and missing the path by which they had past on after the Hebrews; their wheels stuck fast in the mud and quick-sands; and could not be drawn out; the Sea coming against them with supernatural violence.

Lysanus, upon Exod. 14. and others, following the Opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrews, conceived, that after Moses had by the power of God divided the Red Sea, and that the children of Israel were fearful to enter it; Aminadab, Prince, or Leader of the Tribe of Judah, first made the adventure; and that therefore was that Tribe ever after, honoured above the rest, according to the Prophecy of Jacob, Gen. 49. 8. Thy Father's Rod shall bow down unto thee. But Ephraim, upon Hosea 11. condemns this Opinion. And though it be true, that Judah had the first place in all their miracles in the Desert, and, as we now call it, led the Van-guard (whereupon it may be inferred, that he also led the way through the Red Sea) yet, that Moses himself was the Conductor of Israel at that time, it is generally received. For, it is written in the 77. Psalm; Thou didst lead thy people: thy Sheep, by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

The Hebrews have also another fancies, that the Red Sea was divided into twelve parts; and that every Tribe past over in a path apart, because it is written in the 135. Psalm, according to the vulgar: Divisit Mare Rubrum in duodecimas; He divided the Red Sea in divisions. Also that the bottom of the Sea became a green Field, or Pasture. But Origen, Ephraim, Abulensis, and Genebrard, favouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not twelve Pillars, nor twelve Armies of the Egyptians. It is written, Psalm 77. v. 16. Thy way is in the Sea; not thy ways; and in the last Book of Wisdom, ver. 7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now, this Sea, through which Moses past, and in which Pharaoh otherwise called Cherees, perished, in the 16. year of his reign, is commonly known by the name of the Red Sea, though the same differ nothing at all in natural colour from other Waters. But, as Philostratus in his third Book noteth, and our selves know by experience, it is of a bluish colour, as other Seas are. It entrench at a narrow Strait, between Arabia the Happy, and Ethiopia, or the Land of the Abyssinians; the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Ptolemy calleth Possidium, to the other Land of Ethiopia, hath not above six leagues in breadth, and the same also filled every where with Islands, but afterwards is extended itself 58. leagues from coast to coast, and it runneth up between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petrea on one side, and Ethiopia and Egypt on the other, as far as Suez; this utmost end and indraught of that Sea; where the Turk now keeps his fleet of Gallies: The Cosmographers commonly give it the name of the Arabian Gulf; but the North part towards Suez, and wher Moses past, is called Hyperopolites, of the City Hiero, sometime Troy, and of later times Suez. Pliny calls it Cambyses, by which name it was known, saith he, before it was called Hiero, many years. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North, Apocopa, Ecant, and Eant. Arsenidorus writes it Elaniticum: King Juba, Strabon, and others more properly Elaniticum, of the Port and City Elana, which the Septuagint call Elath, Ptolemy, Elana; Pliny, Elana; Josephus, Elana; and Strabon, Elana; Niger, Alia: there is also Ilalab in Affrica, to which Sathanassar carried the Israelites captive, 2 King. 8. 11. which Ilalab in Affrica, the Septuagint call Elath; and in the first of Choro, Ala. But, as for the Red Sea, on the parts thereof thus diversely named, the Moors, and Arabians (Vassals to the Turk) know it by no other appellation, than the Gulf of Meca, after the name of Atahome's Town Meca. The Greeks write it the Sea Erythraum, of a King called Erythras, or Erythras; and because Erythras in the Greek signifieth Red; hence it is, that being denominated of this Erythras, it is the Son of Percus and Andromeda, it took the name of the Red Sea, as Q. Curtius conjectureth, which Arianus and Strabo confirm. But it seems to me, by the view of a Discove-very of that Sea, in the year 1544. performed by Stephen Gama, Viceroy of the East-Indies for the King of Portugal, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of a redness, both from the banks, cliffs, and sands of many Islands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For, I find by the report of Castro, a principal Commander under Gama (which Discourse I gave Mr. Richard Hakluis to publish) that there is an Island called Dalagna, sometime Leques, containing in length, 25. leagues, and 12. in breadth; the earth, lands, and cliffs, of which Island, being of a redish colour, serve for a foil to the waters about it; to make it seem altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Castro reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrional latitude, to 27. (which make in length of Coast 180. miles, lying, as it doth, Northerly & Southerly) all the cliffs, and banks are of red earth, or stone, which by reflection of the Sun-beams, give a kind of redish lustre to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we

we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottom of this Sea, towards the shore, great abundance of red stones, on which the greatest store of Corral grows, which is carried into most parts of Europe, and elsewhere. There are also on the Islands of this Sea, many red Trees, saith Strabo, and those, growing under water, may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of redness by the shadow of these stones, sands, earth, and cliffs, I suppose that it first took the name of the Red Sea, because in so many places it seemeth to be such; which Johannes Barros in his second Decade, eighth Book, and fifth Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea, from Elana, or Ezion Gaber adjoining, now Toro, called by the ancient Cosmographers, Sinns Elaniticus, which washeth the Banks of Madian, or Midian, is for 16. or 17. leagues together, along Northward toward Suez, some 3. leagues, or 9. English miles over; and from this Port of Toro to Suez, and the end of this Sea, it is in length about 28. leagues, of which, the first 26. have 9. miles breadth, as aforesaid, and afterward, the Lands, both from Egypt and Arabia, thrust themselves into the Sea, and strengthen it so fast, as for 6. miles together, it is not above 3. miles over; from thence, upward the Land on Egypt side, falleth away, and makes a kind of Bay, or Cove, for some 10. miles together, after which, the Land grows upon the Sea again, and so binds it in to the very end thereof, at 4. miles breadth, or there about, in which Tract it was that Moses past it over, though others would have it to be over against Elana, or Toro, but without judgment; for from Ramfies to Pihacheroth, and Baalzephon, there is not above 30. miles inter-jacent, or 35. miles at most, which Moses past over in three days; and between the Land of Egypt, opposite to Elana, or Toro, the distance is above 80. miles. For Ramfies, to which City Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gosen) when he left Pharaoh at Zoan, and took his last leave, standeth in 30. degrees 5. minutes of Septentrional latitude; and Migdol, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the Mountain Climax, or Baalzephon, in nine and twenty and a half, which make a difference of five and thirty English miles, the way lying, in effect, North and South.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not a low ebb.

The Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who, in hatred of the Hebrews, have objected that Moses past over the Red Sea at a low ebb, upon a great Spring-tyde, and that Pharaoh, conducted more by fury than discretion, pursued him so far, as before he could recover the coast of Egypt, he was overtaken by the flood, and therein perished; did not well consider the nature of this place, with other circumstances. For, not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plain, that the Waters were divided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly Wind; and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authority to men that believe not therein, perfwadeth nothing) I say, that by the same natural reason unto which they silenced themselves, it is made manifest, that had there bin no other working power from above, or assistance given from God himself to Moses and the children of Israel, than ordinary, and casual, then could not Pharaoh and all his Army have perished in that pursuit.

For whereforever there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulf, or indraught, there do the waters fall away from the Land, and run downwards toward the Ocean, leaving all that part towards the Land, as far as the Sea can ebb, or fall off, to the dry land. Now, Moses entering the Sea at Migdol under Baalzephon (if he had taken the advantage and opportunity of the tide) must have left all that end of the Red Sea towards Suez, on his left hand, dry and uncovered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water 10. or 12. miles farther into the Sea than Suez, and between it and where Moses past, who entered the same so far below it, and towards the body of the same Sea; it followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleeve, or Strait, had been by the ebb of a Spring-tide discovered, when Pharaoh found the flood increasing, he needed not to have returned by the same way toward Egypt side, but might have gone on in his return before the tide, on his right hand; and so taken ground again at the end of the Sea, at Suez it self, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures do truly witness the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth, but that Moses past on between two Seas, and that the waters were divided. Otherwise, Pharaoh, by any return of waters, could not have perished, as he did; and therefore the effects of that great Armies destruction, prove the cause to have bin a power above nature, and the miraculous work of God himself. Again, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to return back by a strong East-wind, do rather prove the miracle, than that there- by by was caused an ebb more than ordinary; for that Sea did not lie East and West, but in effect, North and South. And it must have been a West and North west wind, that must have driven those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East-wind blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell back towards the South and main body thereof; the other part remained toward Suez, and the North. Which being unknown to Pharaoh; while he was checkt by that Sea, which used in times before to ebb away, the flood prest him, and overwhelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Joseph avoweth, that Moses was not onely of excellent judgment, generally, but also, so great a Captain, as he over-threw the Æthiopians in battels, being Employed by Pharaoh, and wan divers Cities, seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemn him of this grossness, and distraction: that rather then he would have endured the hardness of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded to take that way, and fore-told him of the honour which he would there win upon Pharaoh;) he would have trusted to the advantage of an ebbing water. For he knew not the contrary, but that Pharaoh might have found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed, as when it ebb'd, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharaoh's approach, cried out against Moses, and despair'd altogether of their safety; and when Moses prayed unto God for help, he was answered by God; *Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward, and lift thou up thy Rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it: which proves that there was not at that time of Pharaoh's approach any ebb at all, but that God did disperse and cut through the weight of waters, by a strong East-wind, whereby the sands discovered themselves between the Sea on the left hand toward Suez, from whence the Waters moved not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the Waters were a wall unto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the Waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could onely follow them in the same path, not that the Waters stood upright as walls do, as some of the Scholè-men have fancied. For had Pharaoh and the Egyptians perceived any such buildings in the Sea, they would soon have quitted the chase and pursuit of Israel. Further-* more, there is no man of judgment, that can think, that Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the observations of heavenly motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes and refluxes of the Sea, in his own Countrey, on his own coast, and in his own most traded and frequented Ports and Havens; and wherein his people having had so many hundreds of years experience of the tides, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any fore-known or natural accident, but by God's powerfull hand only; which then falleth most heavily on all men, when, looking through no other spectacle but their own prosperity, they least discern it coming, and least fear it. Lastly, if the Army of the Egyptians had been overtaken by the ordinary return of the flood, before they could recover their own coast; their bodies drowned would have been carried with the flood, which runneth up to Suez, and to the end of that Sea, and not have been cast a-shore on the coast of Arabia, where Moses landed, to wit, upon the Sea-bank over against Baalzephon, on Arabia side; where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies, and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary flood would have carried them; Which flood doth not any where cross the Channel, and run athwart it, as it must have done from Egypt side to Arabia, to have cast the bodies there; but it keeps the natural course towards the end of that Sea; and to which their carcases should have been carried, if the work had not been supernatural and miraculous. Apollonius, in the lives of the Fathers, affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which stayed in the country, did not follow Pharaoh in the pursuit of Israel, did ever after honor those beasts, birds, planters or creatures, about which they were buied at the time of Pharaoh's destruction; as he that was then labouring in his Garden, made a god of that Plant or Root about which he was occupied, and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be given else-where. Orosius, in his first Book and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tells us, that in his time, who lived some 400. years after Christ, the prints of Pharaoh's Chariot wheels were to be seen at a low water, on the Egyptian sands; and though they were sometime defaced by wind and weather, yet soon after they appeared again. But hence of I leave every man to his own belief.

CHAP. IV.

Of the journeying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was given them; with a discourse of Laws.

S. I.

A transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie; with a continuation of the Story, untill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

BUt to go on with the Story of Israel, in this sort I collect the times. Moses was born in the year of the World, 2434. Saphim then governing Affria; Oribopolis, Cydonia, or Peloponnesus; Crisius, the Argives; Orus, Egypt; and Denacalon, Thessaly. He fled into Midian, when he had lived forty years, in the year of the World, 2474. and two years after was Caleb born. He returned by the commandment and ordinance of God into Egypt, and wrought his miracles in the fields of Zeus, in the year, 2514. the last Month of the year. On the 14. day of the first Hebrew Month Abib, or the 15. of that Month, beginning the day (as they) at Sun-setting in the year of the World, 2514. was the celebration of the Pasover; & in the dead of the night of the same day, were all the first born slain through Egypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrews inhabited not. The 15. day of the first Month of the Hebrews, called Abib, being about the beginning of the year of the World, 2514. Moses, with the children of Israel removed from the general Assembly at Rameses, and marched to Sinai. And departing thence, they made their third Station at Eihams; and journeying from Eihams, they encamped in the Valley of Phihchereth, or Misgah, under the Mountain Baalzephon; and in the same night, after midnight, they past the Red Sea; Pharaoh and his Army perishing in their return, about the first dawn of the day. Moses having recovered the banks of Arabia, gave thanks unto God for the delivery of Israel; and making no stay on that coast, entered the Deserts of Arabia Petraea, called Sur. But finding no water in that passage, he encamped at Marah, in the Desert of Eihams, which in Exod. 15. 22. is called Sur, 25. miles from the Sea; where the children of Israel, prest with extreme thirst, murmured against Moses the second time; first, at Pharaoh's approach at Phihchereth, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the branches of a Tree, growing near a Lake of bitter water, and casting the same therein, made the same sweet: a plain type and figure of our Saviour; who, upon the Tree of the Cross, changed the bitterness of everlasting death, into the sweetness of eternal life. Pliny remembers these bitter Fountains in his sixth Book, 29. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Egypt, Sesoftris first, Darius after him, and lastly, Ptolemy the second, began to cut an artificial River, thereby by Boats and small Shipping to Trade and Navigate the Red Sea, from the great Cities upon Nilus. From Marah he removed to Elim, the sixth Mansion, a march of eight miles: where finding twelve Fountains of sweet water, and threecore and ten Palm-trees, he rested divers days. Whether this Elim were the name of a Town or City in Moses time, I cannot affirm. And yet the scarcity of waters in that Region was such, as Elim, which had twelve Fountains, could hardly be left unpeopled. William, Archbishop of Tyre, in his History of the Holy Warr, found at Elim, the ruins of a great and ancient City. And at such time as Baldwin the first past that way into Egypt, Ingressus (saith he) Helim Civitatem antiquissimam, populo Israelitico aliquando famularem; ad quem cum pervenisset, loci illius Abula, Regis adventu precegnit, naviculas ingredienti, in Mare vicinum se conulerunt; Entering Elim, a very ancient City, well known sometime to the people of Israel; whither, when he came, the Inhabitants, forewarned of the Kings approach, took Boat, and shifted themselves into the Sea lying near them. From Elim he returned again towards the South, and sat down by the banks of the Red Sea; the seventh Mansion. For it seemeth, that he had knowledge of Amalech, who repaired to refresh his passage through part of Arabia. And Moses, who had not as yet trained the Hebrews, appointed to bear Arms; nor assured the minds of the rest, who encountering with the the least misery, were more apt to return to their quiet slavery, than either to endure the wants and perils which every way accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to undertake or sustain so dangerous an enemy: he therefore made stay at this Mansion, until the fifteenth of this second Moneth, called Zim, or Jiar; and made the eighth Mansion in the Desert of Zin; where the children of Israel mutinied against Moses the third time, having want of food. In the 16. Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retreat from Elim to the Red Sea, but in the collection of every several encamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is set down.

Here it pleased God to send fo many flights of Quails, as the Country about their encamping was covered with them. The morning following, it also rained Manna, being the 16. of their Moneth, which served them in stead of bread. For now was the store consumed which the people carried with them out of Egypt. And though they had great numbers of Cattel and Sheep among them, yet it seemeth, that they durst not feed themselves with many of those; but reserved them, both for the Milk to relieve the Children withall, and for Breed to store themselves when they came to the Land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim, they made two removes of 20. miles; the one to Daphca, the other to Alur, distant from Raphidim six miles. Here, being again prest with want of Water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themselves to be fed and beaten after the manner of Beasts, than to suffer a casual, and sometime necessary want, and to undergo the hazards and travels which every manly mind seeks after, for the love of God, and their own freedoms. But Moses, with the same Rod which he divided the Sea withall, in the sight of the Elders of Israel, brought waters out of the Rock, wherewith the whole multitude were satisfied.

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battel with the Amalekites, and Jethro's coming; who, being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

And while Moses encamped in this place, the Amalekites, who had knowledge of his approach, and ghesied that he meant to lead the children of Israel through their Country (which being barren of it self, would be utterly wasted by so great a multitude of People and Cattel) thought it most for their advantage to set upon them at Raphidim, where the want of water, and all other things needfull for the life of man, enfeebled them. On the other side, Moses perceiving their resolutions, gave charge to Jehro, to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrews, to encounter Amalech. Between whom and Israel the victory remained doubtful, for the most part of the day; the Hebrews and the Amalekites contending with equal hopes and repulses for many hours. And had not the strength of Moses Prayers to God been of far greater force, and more prevalent than all resistance & attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly endangered the whole enterprise. For those bodies which are unacquainted with scarcity of food, and those minds whom a servile education hath dulled, being beaten, and despairing in their first attempts, will hardly, or never, be brought again to hazzard themselves.

After this Victory, Jethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his Wife, and his two Sons, which either Jethro forbore to conduct, or Moses to receive, till he had by this overthrow of Amalech the better assured himself of that part of Arabia. For it is written in Exod. 18. 1. When Jethro, the Priest of Madian, Moses Father-in-law, heard all that God had done for Moses, &c. of which, the last deed, to wit, the overthrow of Amalech, gave Jethro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his Son-in-law, Moses, at Sinai; where, among other things, he advised Moses to appoint Judges, and other Officers over Israel, being himself unable to give order in all causes and controversies, among so many thousands of people, full of discontentment and private controversy.

This Jethro, although he dwelt amongst the Madianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Judges, Verf. 11. 17. it is manifest: where it is written, Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the Son of Jethro, the Father-in-law of Moses, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his Tent: untill the Plain of Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh. Likewise, in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest he should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountains of Sin, Kadesh; and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plains, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites: Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the rock. And that Saul spared this Nation, he giveth giveth for cause, that they shewed mercy to all the children of Israel, when they came up from Egypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the issues of Madian, one of the six Sons which Abraham begat on Keithura: and which also take that name of Kenites from Keithura, of whom they descended by the mother, who (as it seemeth) kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they received from their Parent Abraham. For Moses, when he fled out of Egypt into Madian, and married the Daughter of Jethro, would not (had he found them Idolaters) have made Jethro's Daughter the mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seed of Abraham should root out, and inherit their lands; yet it cannot be meant by these, who are descended from Abraham himself: but by some other Nation, bearing the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in the fifteenth of Genesis, vers. 19. these Kenites, or Chusites, are listed with the Hittites and Perizzites, with the Amorites, Ganaanites, Gergesites, and Jebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites descended from Abraham, had separated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether Idolatrous. For, as it is before remembred, Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites; that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh, or Kadesh. Again, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham's other Sons were born; which he did (referring my self to better judgment) rather, because they were more antient, than by anticipation.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into five Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and Heathens; as those of Madian by the River Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites, near the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his Wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his children, still after the overthrow of Amalech, seem likewise not to have been corrupted. For these Madianites, with the Kenites, assisted Israel, and guided them in the Deserts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petra, were by Israel rooted out, when those adjoining to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian, of whom Jethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not have sent 12000. Israelites, as far back as the Red Sea, from the Plains of Moab, to have destroyed that Madian, where his Wives kined inhabited; seeing himself coming with 60000. able men, was encountered by Amalech in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Deserts, wherein himself and Israel had wandered forty years.

That Jethro, or Jothor, Raguel, or Revel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach us. For the Vulgar, and Septuagint, which call him Raguel, and our English, Revel, Exod. 2. 18. calls him Jethro, or Jothor, Exod. 3. 1. and 4. 18. & 18. 1. & 6. 9. 10. 12. & in Numb. 10. 29. Hobab. Others take Jethro and Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was given; with divers commendations of the invention of Laws.

The rest of the Moneths of this year 2515. were spent in the Desert of Sinai, near the mountain of Sinai, or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai and Horeb were distinct Mountains: Hierom, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For, in Exod. 3. 1. it is called Horeb; and in Exodus 24. 19. it is written Sinai. In the 106. Psalms, vers. 19. Horeb: in Exodus 19. 11. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4. vers. 24. And again, Dent. 4. 10. and 15. and Dent. 5. 2. Horeb. And so it is in the first of Kings 8. 6. and the second of Chronicles 5. 10. and in Malachie 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclusiasticus, 48. 7. they are named as one. Which hearest (saith Ecclusiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the judgment of the vengeance. Somewhat they are disjoined at the top, by the report of Peter Belonius; who, in the year 1588. past out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Funet of France, and travelled to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by far the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very fair Spring of Water into the Valley adjoining: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Maronites, containing some hundred Religious persons of divers Nations, who had pleasant Gardens, delicate Fruits, and excellent Wine. These (saith the same Author) give entertainment to all strangers, which pass that way.

Now, that there was some such Torrent of water near Sinai, in Moses time, it is very probable: First, because he encamped there about almost a year, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: Secondly, because it is written, Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calf to powder, which Aaron set up in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drink thereof.

On this mountain, the Law by the Angel of God was given to Moses, where he stayed a whole year; waiting some ten or twelve days: for he removed not till the twentieth day of the second Month of the second year; and he arrived about the five and fourtieth day after the egression; the Law being given the fiftieth day.

At this Mention all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that Book; all in Leviticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no Story nor other Passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speak somewhat of the Law; and the kinds and use thereof: whereby, if the Reader find the Story any way dis-joyined, he may turn over a few leaves, and, omitting this, find the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, level, and square of Laws: so it pleased God to give thereby unto Moses the powerfulllest man (his miraculous grace excepted) to govern that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For, as the North Star is the most fixed Director of the Sea-man to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the Guide and Conductor of all in general to the haven of eternal life: the Law of Nature from God his eternal Law deduced, the rule of all his creatures; the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and virtuous Men; yea, the very spirit, and the very fitness of every Estate in the World; by which they live and move: the Law, to wit, a just Law, being resemble to an Heart without affection, to an Eye without lust, and to a Mind without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for every man what he hath, and distributeth so every man what he ought to have. This benefit the Antient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Laws were honoured as gods, or, as the Sons of gods: and the rest, that made either additions, or corrections, were commended to all Posterity for men of no less virtue, and no less liberally beneficial to their Countreys, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerors that ever governed them. The Israelites, the Lacedæmonians, and the Athenians, received their Laws from one; as the Israelites, from Moses; the Lacedæmonians, from Lycurgus; the Athenians, from Solon; the Romans, sometime from their first Kings, from their Decem viri, from their Senators, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselves: other from the Prince, Nobility, and Peoples, as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. IV.

Of the name and meaning of the word; Law and Right.

THE word Lex, or Law, is not always taken alike, but is diversly, and in an indifferent fence used. For, if we consider it at large, it may be understood for any rule prescribing a necessary mean, order, and method, for the attaining of an end. And so the Rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Laws. If it is taken for any private Ordinance of Superiours on Inferiours; so the commandments of Tyrants, which they cause to be observed by force, for their Decrees do also usurp that Title, according to the general acceptance of the word Law; of which Plato, Wrote unto them that decreed wicked Decrees, and wrote grievous things. Like- wise, the word is used for the tumultuary resolutions of the People. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Laws, though evil and injurious: Mali lex est, que tumultuaria posita est: it is an evil Law that is made tumultuously. So as all Ordinances, either good or evil, are called by the name of Laws.

The word Law is also taken for the moral habit of our mind, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it self, as to their pattern and plat-form. And thus the Law of the flesh, which the Divines call legem fœnitia, is to be understood. For every law is a kind of pattern of that which is done according unto it: in which sense, as elsewhere, this moral habit or disposition of the heart, is called the frame, or significamentum of the heart: so in S. Paul to the Romans it is called a Law; But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the law of my mind, and leading me captive unto the law of sin. Again, the nature and inclinations of all creatures, are sometime called (a) laws, so far as they agree with the reason of the Law eternal; as the law of a Lion, to be fierce or valiant.

Also private contracts among Merchants, and other Trade-men, do often put on the name of laws. But law, commonly and properly is taken for a right rule, prescribing a necessary mean, for the good of a Commonwealth, or Civil Community. The rest, to wit, the commandments of Tyrants, &c. which have not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquæ, are by Thomas called violentiæ magis quàm leges; rather compulsions than laws: And whatsoever is not just, S. Augustine doth not allow for laws, howsoever established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, quæ nec jura dicenda, nec putanda sunt; The unjust constitutions of men, which are neither to be learned nor thought laws. For, saith Aristotle, Legalia iustæ sunt factiô, & conservatiua felicitatis; Just laws are the workers and preservers of happiness: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life everlasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the Law, saith Plato, is God, and his worship: Finis legis Deus & cultus ejus. Lex, or the Law, is so called by the Latines, à legendo, or, à ligando, of reading, or binding: Leges quia lætæ & ad populum lætæ, saith Varro; For, after Laws were written and published, all men might read them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymologie, à ligando, is no less agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoak, and a band: as constringent jugum, diruperunt vincula; they have broken the yolk, they have broken the bands. And in the second Psalm, Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & projiciamus a nobis funes ipsorum; Let us break their bands asunder, and let us cast away their cords from us.

The Covenant it is called, because of the conditional promises of God; and because of God's people's voluntary submission of themselves unto it: for which word the Septuagint, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, use the word athana, a Testament, or last Will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectual for our salvation, but in respect of the death of the Testator; for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force, as Heb. 9. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrews call the Law Thorah, of teaching, because every man is thereby taught his duty, both to God and Men. The Greeks call it Nomos, of distributing, because it distributeth to every man his own due; the power of the Law is the power of God: Justice being an attribute proper unto God himself. Imperium legis, imperium Dei est; The reign of the Law is the reign of God.

Law in general is thus defined by the Philosophers; Lex est vitæ regula, præcipiens quæ sunt sequenda, & quæ fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to shun: or, Lex est omnium divinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queen, or Princess of things both humane and divine. But this description is grounded upon the opinion of inevitable fate. Law is the very wisdom of Nature: the reason and understanding of the prudent; and the rule of right and wrong. For, as a right line is called, Index sui, & curvi, the demonstration of it self, and of the crooked; so is the Law, the judge and measure of right and wrong.

M. Hooker calls the Law a directive rule to goodness of operation; and though Law, as touching the substance & essence, consists in understanding: Concludit tamen aliam voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Jus is also diversly taken, as sometime for the matter of the Law, and for common right: sometime for the Law it self, as Jus civile, or Jus gentium. Isidore distinguisheth the two general words, Jus and Fas; whereof Jus, saith he, hath reference to men, Fas to God. Fas lex divina, Jus lex humana, ist. 2. 20. To go over another man's field, is permitted by Gods Law, not by Man's; and therefore in a thing out of controversy, Virgil used both these words: as Fas & jura sinunt, God and men permit.

The word Jus, or Right, is derived or taken from the old Sufstantive Noun jussus, a bidding or commandment: or, perhaps, from the Greek zws, which is the name of Jupiter, or of the Latine Genitive case Jovis; because, as the Scripture speaks, the judgment is God's. For, as it is certain that jusjurandum came of Jovis-jurandum (for so we find it written in Nonius out of the antient, in which sense the Scripture calls it juramentum Jehovæ) so also we may say, that Jus came of Jovis, quia Jovis est; because as God is the Author, and Pattern, and Maintainer of right, so also in his Vicegerents, the Magistrates, he is the Pronouncer and Executor of right. Of this Jus, the just are denominated, Justus à jure, and Justitia à jussu; The Right gives name to the Righteous, and Justice takes her name from the just.

of the definition of Laws, and of the Law eternal.

But, because Laws are manifold, and that every kind hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to divide and distinguish them. I mean, those sorts of Laws from whence all other particulars are drawn: leaving the individuals of humane laws to their infinite and horrible confusion.

P. 1. q. 1. art. 1.

Th. 1. 36. art. 1.

The Law Eternal is thus defined by Thomas. Lex eterna est eternus divine sapientie conceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso preconcepturum. The eternal Law is the eternal conceit of God's Wisdom, as it is referred to the government of things foreknown by himself. Or, Lex eterna est summa atque eterna ratio divine sapientie, quatenus res omnes ad destinatos fines ita dirigat, ut illis iuxta conditionem ipsarum modum aliquem necessitatis adferat. It is high and eternal reason of divine sapience: as it directeth all things in such sort to their proper ends, imposing a kind of necessity, according to their several natures, or conditions. Now, the difference lies in this: That as the same divine understanding directs all these to their proper ends, so it is called Providence: but, as it imposeth a necessity, according to the nature of all things which it directs, so it is called a Law.

Of this eternal Law, Cicero took knowledge, when in his Book of Laws, he wrote in this manner: Erant ratio perfecta rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & a dilecto advocans: que non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est, sed tum orta est. Orta autem simul est cum mente divina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta ad jubendum & ad vetandum, ratio est recta summi Jovis. That perfect reason and nature of things, incouraging or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling us back from evil, did not (saith he) then begin to be a law when it was written, but when it had begun. Being and beginning it had together with divine understanding, and therefore a true Law, and a fit Prince to command and forbid, is the right reason of the most high God. This eternal Law (if we consider it in God, or as God) is always one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to divers objects, so the reason of man finds it divers and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessary, as the motions of the heavens, stability of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent: another law to men, another to other creatures, having life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternal Law, all things are directed, as by the counsel and providence of God: from this Law, all laws are derived, as from the rule universal, and thereto referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternal, and the divine Law, differ only in consideration: the eternal directing more largely: as well every creature, to their proper and natural ends, as it doth Man to his supernatural: but the divine Law to a supernatural end only: the natural law is thence derived, but an effect of the eternal: as it were a stream from the fountain.

The Law humane or temporal is also thence drawn: in that it hath the form of right reason; from which if it differ, it is then impossible iniqua, a wicked imposition; and onely borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternal Law all things are subjected, as well Angels and Men, as all creatures, creatures, or things created; whether necessary or contingent; natural or moral, and humane. For the Law eternal runneth through all the universal, and therefore it is the Law also of things which are simple, natural and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creator and Director: as Psalm him angelic Angels: praise him Sun and Moon, all bright Stars: Heavens of heavens, for he hath established them for ever and ever. He hath made an ordinance which shall not pass: Praise ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons: and all Deep; fire and hail, snow and vapours, stormy winds which execute his word: mountains and hills, fruitful trees, and all Cedars; Beasts and all Cattel, &c. Now, as the reasonable creatures are by this eternal Law bound, by the glory and felicity proposed unto them (beatitude being both the attractive, and the end) so all other natural things and creatures have in themselves, and in their own natures, an obedience formal to it, without any proper intention, known cause, or end proposed. For Beasts are led by sense and natural instinct: thinks without life by their created form, or formal appetites, as that which is heave to fall downward; things light to mount upward, &c. and fire to heat whatsoever is applied. This kind of working, the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature; others to fate: a difference used in terms only; it being no other than God's general providence: for, as it is truly said of God, that he is omnis super omnia: so are all things which appear in themselves thence derived, thence under subjected, thence from by his eternal Law and providence directed, even from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heaven and in earth.

The Schoolmen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these laws: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternal Law. But, as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who have thence from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetitions, to conduct them: so is the object and matter of the Law, the whole creature. For, according to S. Augustine, Lex eterna est, quia iustum est, ut omnia sint ordinatissima; The Law eternal is that, whereby it is just, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternal law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which S. Augustine useth a sufficient argument in his first Book of Free-will, the sixth Chapter. For the law of Moses, which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last until the time of the Pædagogic of God's people, or Introduction to Christ, should be expired; which time of expiration, some think our Saviour noted to be come, when on the Cross he said, Consummatus est. But I rather think these words of our Saviour to have no other signification, than that now the Prophecies of their giving him Vinegar to drink was fulfilled. For so S. John expounds it, when he saith, *22. 28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, Ut consummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I deny not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremonial, and of so much of the judicial, as appertained peculiarly to the Jews, and agreeth not with the Law of the New Testament and Gospel of Christ. For the immutable Law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in itself; but the things prescribed change according to this eternal ordinance, of which the Wisdom of Solomon, and being one, she can do all things, and remaining in her self, reneweth all.*

§. VI.

Of the Law of Nature.

Of the Law of Nature, as it is taken in general, I find no definition among the School-men; only as it is considered in Man, it is called The Impression of divine Light, and a participation of the eternal Law in the reasonable creature. Lex Naturalis est impressio divini luminis in nobis, & participatio Legis eterne in rationali creatura. Ulpian defines the natural Law to be the same which Nature hath taught all living creatures: Jus naturale est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and he afterward addeth, Jus istud non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium que terra marique nascuntur, avium quoque commune est. The Law of Nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all living creatures, as well Birds, as to those the Land and Sea produceth. But this definition is not general, but of the natural Law in things of life.

The Law of Nature in general, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formal quality, which God in his eternal Providence hath given and imprinted in the nature of every creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is divinum lumen in men, enlightning our formal reason; so is it more than sense in Beasts; and more than vegetation in Plants. For it is not sense alone in Beasts, which teacheth them, at first sight, and without experience or instruction, to flee from the enemies of their lives: seeing that Bulls and Hories appear unto the sense more fearfull and terrible, than the least kind of Dogges; and yet the Hare and Deer feedeth by the one, and fleeth from the other; yea, though by them never seen before; and that as soon as they fall from their Dams: Neither is it sense, which hath taught other Beasts to provide for Winter, Birds to build their Nests high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the Birds of India, to make their Nests on the smallest twigs which hang over Rivers, and not on any other part of the Tree, or elsewhere, to save their Eggs and young ones from the Monkeys and other Beasts, whose weight such a twig will not bear; and which would fear to fall into the Water. The instances in this kind are exceeding many which may be given. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of Plants, that some Trees, as the female of Palmitto; will not bear any fruit, except the male grow in sight. But this they do by that Law, which the infinite and unsearchable Wisdom of God had in all eternities provided for them, and for every nature created. In Man this Law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt: corrupt, where the reason of Man hath made its self subject, and a Vassal to Passions, and Affections Brutal: and incorrupt, where time and custom hath bred in Men a new nature, which also, as is aforesaid, is a kind of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which S. Augustine calleth the Law of Reason, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did antiently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by Law constrain'd to become Idolaters; that by the Laws of Lycurgus it was permitted to men to use one another's Wife, and to the women, to choose them others besides their Husband, to beget them with child: which Law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

The Syrians, and the People of both Indies, hold it lawfull to bury with them the best beloved Wives: as also they have many other customs remembered by G. Valentia, against nature and right reason.

And I know not from what authority it is, that these Laws come men avow to be natural: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithless among the faithless: to provide for our selves by another man's destruction: that Injury is not done to him that is willing, to destroy those whom we fear, and the like. For taking the definition of natural laws, either out of S. Augustine, or

Aquinas: (the one calling it The impression of divine light; the other, the dictate, or sentence of practique reason) the same can teach us, or incline us to no other thing, than to the exercise of Justice and uprightness: and not to offer or perform any thing toward others, save that which we would be content should be offered or performed, toward our selves. For, such is the Law of Nature to the Mind, as the Eye is to the Body; and that which, according to David, sheweth us good, that is, the observation of those things which lead us thereby to our last end; which is eternal life; though, of themselves not sufficient without faith and grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the law, is, as aforesaid, the impression of God's divine light in men, and a participation of the law increased and eternal. For without any law written, the right reason and understanding, which God hath given us, are abilities within our selves, sufficient to give us knowledge of the good and evil, which by our gratitude to God and distribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchase for our selves. For when the Gentiles (saith S. Paul) which have not the law, do by nature those things contained in the law: they having not the law, are a law unto themselves. Now, to love God, by whom we are, and to do the same right unto all men, which we desire should be done unto us, is an effect of the purest reason; in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of Conscience hath made her resting place and habitation: In arce altissima rationis quies habitat. Therefore the Gentiles (saith S. Paul) which shew the effects of the law written in their hearts, have their consciences for a witness of those effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a law unto himself (while he hopeth to abuse the World by the advantage of hypocrisy) worketh nothing else, but the betraying of his own Soul, by crafty unrighteousness, purchasing eternal perdition. For it helpeth us not to hide our corrupt hearts from the World's eye, seeing from him, who is an infinite eye, we cannot hide them: some Garlands we may gather in this May-game of the World, sed vos ille dum loquimur, arefit; Those flowers wither, while we discourse of their colours, or are in gathering them. That we should therefore inhabit and dwell within our selves, and become fearfull Witnesses of our secret evils, did that reverend Philosopher Pythagoras teach in this golden Precept: Nil turpe committas, neque coram aliis, neque tecum; maxime omnium verere te ipsum; Commit nothing foul or dishonest; saith he, neither to be known to others, nor to thine own heart: but above all men, reverence thine own Conscience. And this may be a Precept of Nature and right Reason; by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodies are inclined to those operations, which are answerable to their own form; as Fire to give heat. Now, as the reasonable mind is the form of Man, so is he aptly moved to those things which his proper form presenteth unto him; to wit, that which right Reason offereth; and the Acts of right Reason, are the acts of Vertue; and in the breach of the rules of this Reason, is a man least excusable: as being a reasonable creature. For all else, both sensitive, growing, and inanimate, obey the Law which God imposed on them at their first creation.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the bud of the Herb, which seedeth seed, &c. and the Beast, which liveth thereon. He gave a law to the Seas, and commanded them to keep their bounds; which they obey. He made a decree for the Rain, and a way for the Lightning of the Thunders. He caused the Sun to move, and to give light, and to serve for signs, and for seasons. Were these as rebellious as Man, for whose sake they were created; or did they once break the Law of their natures and forms; the whole World would then perish, and all return to their first Chaotic darkness, and confusion.

By this natural Law, or law of humane Reason, did Cain perceive his own wickedness and offence, in the murder of Abel: for he not only feared the displeasure of God, but the revenge of men; as being written in his reason, that whatsoever he performed towards others, the same by others might be done unto him again. And that this judgment of well and evil doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternal Law, before the Law written; lights in the person of God, witnesseth, Gen. 4. If thou do well, shalt thou not be accepted; and if thou do not well, sin lieth at thy door.

The Schoolmen are large also in this Question, of the natural Law; the same being opened amply by Reinardus, Junonius; and Valentia. But it is not my purpose to write a Volume of this Subject.

But this law which Thomas Aquinas calleth An act of Reason taken properly; and not a habit, as it is an evident natural judgment of practick reason; they divide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration

(as that good is to be followed, and evil eschewed) and demonstrable, which is evidently proved out of higher and more universal propositions. Again, as it answereth the natural appetite, prescribing things to be defined as good, or to be avoided as evil (as of the first, to desire to live, and to satisfy hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew pains, sorrow, and death) in this consideration they divide it, according to the divers kinds of appetites that are in us. For in every man there are three sorts of appetites, which answer the three degrees of natural Law. The first is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the desire, both to live, and to preserve our being and life; as also the desire of issue, with care to provide for them: for the Father, after his death, lives in his children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemonstrable laws of Nature, for the most part. For it needs no proof, that all creatures should desire to be, to live, and to be defended; and to live in their issue, when they cannot in themselves. And as Man is a Being, Ens or Res; so he doth desire good, and shun evil. For it is common to all things, to desire things agreeable to their own natures, which is, to desire their own good. And so is good defined by Aristotle, to be that which all desire. Which definition Basil upon the 44. Psalm approveth: Recte habent bonum desiderant, quod omnia expiunt; Rightly have some men defined good, or goodness, to be that which all things desire.

The second kind of appetite, is of those things which appertain unto us, as we have sense. Whence, by the law of Nature, we desire the delights of every sense; but with such moderation, as may neither glut us with satiety, nor hurt us with excess. For as Sense it self is for the preservation of life and being; so is it meet, even by the law of Nature, that the sensitive appetite should not carry us to the destruction, either of our life or being. And although (seeing both these kinds of appetites are in Beasts) we may well say; that Nature hath given divers laws unto them: In which sense the Civilians define natural Right, or Jus naturale, to be the same which Nature hath taught all living creatures: Yet the Schoolmen admit not, that the instincts of Beasts can properly be called a law, but only a Jus, or Right, which is the matter, and aim of every law. For so they distinguish it; where Ulpian affirmeth, that Jus naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all living creatures. In this place (saith Valentia) Jus is not to be taken for for a law, but for the matter of the law. And yet where Ulpian also distinguisheth the right belonging to living creatures in general, from the right belonging to men; calling the one Jus Nature, the other Jus Gentium: the Divines understand the law of Nature more largely, that is, for all evident dictates, precepts, or biddings of divine reason, both in Beasts and Men; and restrain the law of Nations to a kind of humane right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertain properly to Man, as he is a living creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our selves: and the laws of this appetite are the commandments of our Religion.

Now, although there are many other branches and divisions of this law of Nature answering the division of matter, which it prescribeth, and as manifold, as the moral actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth; yet is the law of Nature but one law, according to Aquinas: first, because it hath one fountain or root in the natural or motive faculty, which is but one, stirring up to good, and declining the contrary: secondly, because all is contained in that general natural precept, That good is to be followed, and ill avoided: and thirdly, because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last end.

That this law of Nature binds all creatures, it is manifest; and chiefly Man; because he is endowed with reason: in whom as reason groweth, so this band of observing the law of Nature increaseth; Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc est quod scriptum est, adveniente mandato peccatum revocatur; When reason grew to perfection, then it came to pass, which was written by S. Paul, When the commandment came, sin revolved. Neither is it a small warrant for this law of Nature, when those that break the same, are said by S. Paul, To be delivered over into a reprobate sense (or mind) to do those things which are not convenient: And against that the consciences bear witness, and their thoughts accuse them. For, though this law of Nature stretch not to every particular; as to command fasting, and the like; yet it commandeth in general all good, and whatsoever is agreeable to right and reason. And therefore said Damasius; Hominis facti sunt mali, declinatio in id quod contra naturam est; Men (saith he) are made evil, by declining unto that which is contrary to Nature: And S. Augustine, Omne vitium natura nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam est; Every vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary unto it.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of Nature so freight, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For, whereas by this law, all men are born Lords of the Earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to unequal merit: by taking from the evil, and giving to the good; and by permitting and commanding that all men shall enjoy the fruits of their labours to themselves: according to the rules of Justice and Equity.

And though the law of Nature command, that all things be restored which are left in trust, yet in some cases, this her law the suffereth to be broken: as to deny a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was sober. But the Universal principles can no more be changed, than the decrees of God are alterable: who, according to S. Paul, alideth faithful, and cannot deny himself.

§. VII.

Of the written Law of God.

After the Eternal, and Natural, the law Positive or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather an explication of the former, hath two kinds; Divine, and Humane. Again, the Divine positive law is double; the Old, and New: The Old was given unto Moses in Mount Sinai, or Horeb, at such time as the World had stood 2513. whole years: and in the 67. day of this year, when as Asiaticus, or Asiaticus governed the Assyrians, Marathus the Sycionians, Triops the Argives, Cecrops Attica, and Acherres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham, 430. years. And this, it seems, was the first written law which the World received. For the very word Nomos, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after, invented by the Grecians; no, not in Homer's time, who lived after the fall of Troy 80. years at least; and Troy it self was cast down 335. years, after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This law, it pleased God to engrave in Stone, that it might remain a lasting Book of his expressed Will in the Church: and that the Priests and People might have whereof to meditate, till the coming of Christ: and that so these Children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous People in Egypt, might be without excuse, the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason known to us, why this law was not written before, is, that when the People were few, and their lives long, the Elders of Families might easily, without any written law, instruct their own Children; and yet, as they increased, so doubtless they had, besides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before before the law written. But now at length, for as much as the law of Nature did not define all kinds of good, and evil; nor condemn every sin in particular: nor sufficiently terrify the consciences of offenders; nor so expound divine Worship, as for those ages was required; who gave every day less authority than other to the natural law; In these respects it was necessary, that the law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men; which before, they might, but would not, read in their own consciences. The school-men, and the Fathers before them, enlarge the causes and necessity, why the law was written; whereof these are the chiefest:

The first, for restraining of sin, directly grounded upon this place of David, The law of the Lord is undefiled, converting souls: The testimony of the Lord are faithful, giving wisdom to children. For the humane law, saith S. Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit; but the divine law written, forbiddeth every evil, and therefore, by David, it is called undefiled.

Secondly, it serveth for the direction of our minds. For the laws of men can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internal motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that we be no less clean in the one; than in the other. And therefore were the words converting our souls, added by David: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cubalists. Adiones hominum nulla essent, nisi prius in mente dicentur; The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the mind.

Thirdly, it leadeth us to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diversity of Opinion, and difference of peculiar laws among sundry Nations, we cannot be assured of; but the Law of GOD bindeth all men; and is without error; and therefore also said David, That the testimony of the Law of God is faithful, giving wisdom to children.

§. VIII.

Of the unwritten Law of God, given to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

NOW, that in all this long tract of Time, between the Creation and the written Law, the World and People of God were left altogether to the law of Reason and Nature, it doth not appear. For the Patriarchs of the first Age received many Precepts from God himself, and whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was observed by Seth, who instructed Enos; from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Yea, many particular commandments afterward written, were formerly imposed and delivered over by tradition; which kind of teaching the Jews afterward called Cabala, or Receptio; Precepts received from the mouth of their Priests and Elders; to which the Jews after the law written, added the interpretation of secret Mysteries, reserved in the bosoms of their Priests, and unlawful to be uttered to the People. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeed the divine Law revealed to the Patriarchs, and from them delivered to the Posterity, when as yet it was unwritten. The commandments which God gave unto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all Beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of understanding, they were sufficiently known. For, finding the reason of his own name Adam, or Adamah, Earth, or red clay, he gave other names significant, not only to Beasts, but to his Children and Nephews, which afterward his Disciples imitated: as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather one given in recompence for Abel, that was slain; and Eloah signifieth Man, or miserable. Further, God committed Adam to till the Ground, and to live by the labour thereof: God also gave him the choice of all fruits, but the forbidden; and in Adam also was Marriage first instituted, all men thenceafter being commanded to co-habit with their Wives, rather than with their Father or Mother.

That murder and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the Law written, and before the Flood it self, it is manifest. God himself making it appear, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of Mankind by the general Flood. For God said unto Noah, An end of all flesh is come before me; for the Earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold, I will destroy them from the Earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be unknown to all that perished: God's Mercy and Justice interposing between the untaught and Revenge. This Commandment God repeated to Noah, after the Waters were dried up from the Earth: Whoso sheddeth Man's Blood, by Man shall his Blood be shed; for in the image of God hath He made Man.

Also the law of honouring and reverence-

ing our Parents, was observed among the faithful, and the contrary punished by the Father's curse: as, Cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants shall be unto his brethren. Again, we find that the unnatural sin of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree as with fire from Heaven. The sin of Adultery and Ravishment, was before the Law no less detested than the rest, as appeareth by that revenge taken for Dinah's forcing: and by the judgment which Juda gave against Tamar, That he should be burnt; and by the repentance of Pharaoh and Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced. Thou art but dead, because of the woman which thou hast taken; for she is a man's Wife. To these we may add the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of clean and unclean Beasts, of Circumcision, of the brother to raise up seed to his brother that left a Widow, childless, and divers other constitutions, partly Moral, and partly Ceremonial, which being delivered before the written Law were atter by it confirmed. So that this Divine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called, The Old Testament, may be said, not only to have been written in the hearts of men, before it was engraven in stone, but also in substance to have been given in Precept to the Patriarchs. For, as S. Paul witnesseth of himself, I knew what sin, but by the Law; so ever the Law naturally preceded, and went before offence, though written offences committed. It is true; that all the creatures of God were directed by some kind of unwritten Law; the Angels, intuitively; Men, by reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; Plants by their vegetative powers; and things inanimate, by their necessary motions, without sense or perception.

Of the Moral, Judicial, and Ceremonial Law, with a note prefixed, how the scripture speaketh not always in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

Now, as the word, (Law) in general, as is aforesaid, hath divers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which both prescribe and restrain; so the Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diversly: as sometime for the Old Testament, as, Now we know that whatsoever the Law saith, it saith to them which are under the Law.

When it is opposed, or differed from the Prophets and Psalms; it is there taken for the five Books of Moses. For so S. Luke hath distinguished them, as, *All must be fulfilled, which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the *Psalms.

When it is opposed to the Gospel, then it is taken for the Law Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is justified by Faith, without the works of the Law.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the Law, and summum jus; as, For ye are not under the law, but under grace.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely; where the Ceremonies or Signs are taken for the things signified; as, The sacrifice for Christ, and the like; then it signifieth but shadows and figures; as, *The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by *Jesus Christ.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christ's coming, it signifieth the whole policy of the Jews Common-wealth, as, Before Faith came, we were kept under the law, &c. Or the law of the Order and Institution of the Aaronical Priesthood; as, *All the Prophets of the law, or the Priests, prophesied unto *John. And if the Priesthood be changed, the Law, also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs be changed.

The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constraining forces; as, The law of the Spirit of life, the law of the force of sin, and death, the enforcements of conscience, &c.

But the Written Law of Moses, or the law of the Old Testament, of which we now speak, is thus defined. The law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holiness and Justice, promising eternal life conditionally, that is, to the observers of the Law, and threatening Death to those which break the Law in the least. For according to S. James, Whosoever shall keep the whole, and fail in one point, it is guilty of all. The definition used by the School-men, in which both the Old and New Law are comprehended, is thus given: Lex divina est divinum decretum, hominibus prescribens modum necessarium, ut apte pervenire possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quæ est ultimus humane vite finis; the divine Law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing unto men a necessary mean, whereby they may aptly attain supernaturalem beatitudinem, which is the last end of man's life.

The Law of Moses hath three parts: Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial. The Moral part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that evil to be avoided, in particular; particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to be done; as, Do this, for I am the Lord; whereas the law of Nature commands it but in general. Again, the Moral law en-treatheth of virtue and goodness; the Ceremonial of divine service, and of holiness; (for external worship, and the order of hal-lowing our selves unto God, is called Cere-mony) and the Judicial teacheth the particu-lar government, fit for the Common-wealth of the Jews, and prescribeth orders for justice and equity. And therefore was it said of S. Paul, The Commandment is just; holy, and good: just, or justice being referred to the Judicial; holy, or holiness to the Ceremoni-al; good, or honest to the Moral. The Judicial part is touching the government of the Common-wealth of the Jews, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons.

The Ceremonial is divided into four parts, according to the four kinds of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, holy things, Sacraments, and Observances. To Sac-rifices belong Beasts, and the Fruits of the earth; to holy things the Tabernacle, Tem-ple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacra-ments, Circumcision, the Passover, and such like. For Observances, they consisted either in prohibition of certain meats, as not to eat the blood and fat of Beasts; or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifying, anointings, and attire, as not to wear mix'd Garments of Linnen and Woollen: as also it prohibiteth other unnatural and improper commixtion; as, Thou shalt not yoke together in a Plough, an Ox and an Ass, or cast mingled seed in one field. It also exhorteth to natural compassion, and forbiddeh cruelty, even to Beasts, Birds, and Plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed with-out any profit to man. For so some refer these Precepts, Thou shalt not kill the Bird sitting on her Nest, nor beat down the Buds of the Tree, nor muzzle the labouring Ox, and the like, to the Ceremonial Law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respect the same power which it had before the coming of Christ. For the Moral liveth still, and is not abrogated or taken away; laying in the ability of justifying or condemning; for therein are we command-ed to love and worship God: and to use charity one towards another; which for ever shall be required at our hands. Therein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done; which power of direct-ing by special Rules and Precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be observed: though principally for fear of God in the one, and for the love of God in the other.

The Ceremonial also lived in the things which it fore-signified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body it self is represented to us. Besides, it still liveth, in that it giveth both instruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giveth direction to the Church, for some Ceremo-nies and Types of holy signification, which are still expedient; although in a far fewer number than before Christ's coming, and in a fair less degree of necessity.

Lastly, the Judicial liveth in substance, and concerning the end, and the natural and universal equity thereof.

But the Moral faileth in the point of justi-fication, the Ceremonial as touching the use and external observation (because Christ himself is come, of whom the Ceremonies were signs and shadows) and the Judicial is taken away, as far forth as it was peculiar to the Jews Common-wealth and Policy.

A Proposal of nine other points to be consid-ered, with a touch of the five first.

As for that which remaineth in general consideration of the divine. Written Law, it may in effect be reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Majesty of the Law-giver.
3. The property and peculiarity of the People receiving it.
4. The conveniency of the time in which it was given.
5. The efficacy and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.
7. The end and use of the Law.
8. The sense and understanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the Law is sufficiently proved by S. Paul, in these words: Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandment is holy, and just, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforesaid, to the Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial.

2. The Majesty of the Law-giver is ap-proved in all his creatures; who, as he hath given all things their lives and beings, so he only gave the Law, who could only give the end and reward promised, to wit, the salvation of Mankind; but he gave it not to Moses immediately, but by the ministry of Angels, as it is said: And the Law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: And in the A.M. he gave the Law by the Ordinance of Angels.

Gal. 3. 19.

3. The Propriety and Peculiarity of the People receiving the Law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared. Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and dissevered. Thirdly, in that they were the Children of the Promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and severed they were, because of God's choice and election. Children of the Promise they were, for the Promise was made by God unto Abraham and his seed; not unto his seeds, as to Elsan and Jacob, but to his seed, as to Jacob or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now, to Abraham and his seed, was the Promise made; he saith not, to the seeds, as speaking of many, but, to thy seed, as of one, which is Christ.

Gal. 3. 6.

4. The convenience of the time, in which it was given, is noted by S. Augustine; that it was about the middle time, between the Law of Nature and Grace: the Law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses; the Law written in the commandments received by Moses in the Worlds year, 2514, continued to the Baptism of John; from which time, began the Law of Grace, which shall continue to the worlds end. Other reasons for the convenience are formerly given.

5. The fifth consideration is of the efficacy of this Law, the same being a disposition to, or sign of our Justification; but not by it self sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousness in moral precepts. For through the Passion of Christ were sins forgiven, who taketh away the sins of the World: and therefore S. Paul calleth the Rudiments of the Law, beggarly and weak; beggarly, as containing no Grace, weak, as not able to forgive and justify. The blood of Goats and Bulls, and the Ashes of an Heifer could only cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christ's blood, which doth cleanse the inward Soul. For if the Law could justify, then Christ died in vain.

Gal. 8.

§. XI.

Of the sixth Point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.

The old and new Testament differ in name, and in the mean and way. proposed for attaining to salvation; as the old by Works, the new by Grace; but in the thing it self, or object and remote end, they agree; which is, mans happiness and salvation.

The old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesses of Gods Will, was called the old, because it preceded the new Testament; which is an explication of the old: from which the new taketh witness. Yet the new is of more excellency, in that it doth more lively express, and openly and directly delineate the ways of our redemption. It is also called the old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: in that he saith, the new Testament, he hath abrogated the Old. For the old Law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and delivered with wonderfull miracles; yet was it constituted in a policy perishable; but the new was given in a promise of an everlasting Kingdom, and therefore called in the Apocalypse, a Testament and Gospel, for ever during.

The old Testament is called the Law, because the first and chief part is of the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalms are Commentaries, expounding that Law.

The new Testament is called the Gospel, because the first and chief part thereof, is the glad tidings of our Redemption: the other Books, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts; or Story of the Apostles, are plentiful Interpreters thereof: The word Evangelium, signifying a joyful, happy, and prosperous message. or (as Homer used it) the reward given to the Messenger bringing joyful news. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing success, as by Kenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tidings in general, as in Ezay 52. v. 7. concerning peace. Secondly, by an excellency it is restrained, to signify that most joyful message of Salvation, as in Luke 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Christ; and so we understand the four Gospels.

Mat. 1.

Lastly, for the preaching and divulging the Doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9. 14. and 2 Cor. 8. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I think, as they are divided in Volumes) is by Danens comprised in these four.

In their Author.

In the substance of the Covenant, or things promised.

In the foundation, to wit, Christ.

In the Effects, that is, in Righteousness and Justification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament

ment and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was ever one Church, so was there one Covenant and Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ; the old proposing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one and the same end, even the salvation of our Souls; which, according to S. Peter, is the end of our Faith. For although it be said, that Moses did promise by observing the law, an earthly kingdom, a land flowing with Milk and Honey, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings; yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spiritual blessings by Christ, for by the earthly, he raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers, notwithstanding their worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselves strangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Hierusalem; according to this place of the Hebrews; All these died in faith, and received not the promises, but saw them afar off, and believed them, confessing that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. To which purpose also S. Augustine, *Omnino pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes per promissa terrena, eterna promitti; Few (saith he) do understand the old law; not attending that by things earthly, eternal are promised. And S. Hierom, Noluit Deus pacere Judæos: more pecorum corporalibus donis epulisque, ut Judæi somniant: God would not feed the Jews, as beasts with corporal gifts and riches, as themselves dream. And this may be gathered out of God's own words, Ego sum Deus tuus; & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, prove that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gave them this promise, but in respect of the future; to wit, the safety of their Souls. For as God created both Body and Soul, so hath he of his goodness, not left the better part uncared for; which liveth ever.*

roduction (for to those which acknowledged their sin and misery, God sheweth his mercy and salvation) may be said to agree with the Gospel in the effect. For otherwise, if we sever the law from subordination to the Gospel, the effects are very different; the one sheweth the way of righteousness by works, the other by faith; the law woundeth, the Gospel healeth; the Law testifieth, the Gospel allureth; Moses accuseth, Christ defendeth; Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The old restrained the hand, the new, the mind. Data est lex qua non sanaretur (saith S. Augustine) sed que aggratantes probaret. The law was given, not to help, but to discover sickness; and S. Chrysostom; Data est lex, ut homo inveniret; non ut morbus sanaretur, sed ut medicus quaeretur. The law was given, that man might find and know his own imperfection; not that his disease was thereby helped, but that he might then seek out the Physician. For Christ came to save the World, which the Law had condemned. And as Moses was but a Servant, and Christ a Son; so the greatest benefit was reserved to be brought, as by the worthiest person, saith Cyril; for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

Hb. 7.

Lb. 18. §.

Of the rest of the points proposed.

The seventh Consideration is of the end, and use of the Law; which is, to bring us to Christ; for finding no righteousness in our own works, we must seek it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and utmost end; the next and proper end of the Law, is to prescribe righteousness, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Curset is he that continueth not in all the things of this Law.

The second end of the Law, is to render us inexcusable before God; who knowing so perfect a Law, do not keep it; the Law requiring a perfect and entire, not a broken or half obedience; but both inward and outward righteousness, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and chief end of the law, is, as hath been said, to lead us to Christ, and his Grace, being in our selves condemned and lost. For the law was delivered with thunder, and with a most violent and fearful tempest, threatening eternal death.

The fourth end of the law was to design, and preserve, the place of the Church and true People of God; and to hold men in one Discipline, and aw, till the coming of Christ;

Christ: after whom the Church was to be dispersed over the whole World.

These be the ends of the Moral Law. The end and use of the Ceremonial law, is to confirm the truth of Christ, and the new Testament. The use of the Judicial, to teach us natural equity and right, whereto we must conform our selves.

The fence and understanding of the law is double, literal, and spiritual; by the literal, we are taught the worship and service of God; by the spiritual, the figures and mystical fore-speakings of Christ.

Cr. 49. 10. The Scapter shall not depart from us.
Law giver from between his feet, until Shiloh
come.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the Law, the same had being until the Pas-Christ sion of Christ; before which time, and while Christ taught in the World, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true sacrifice was offered upon the Altar of the Cross; then the Jewish sacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and Figures of Christ (Christ being the Body of those shadows) ceased to bind the conscience any longer; the mystery of our Redemption being now by Christ, and in him, finished. In token whereof the veil of the Temple rent afunder; noting that the ceremonial veils and shadows were now to be removed, not that the moral law of the Commandments was hereby abolished, or weakened at all; otherwise than that it had not power to condemn according to the Jewish doctrine, as afore said. For the observing of the law was by Christ himself severly commanded; our love towards God being thereby to be witnessed.
And herein David so much rejoiced, as he preferred the observation of the law before all that the World could yield.

1 John 5. In testimonium tuorum delectatus sum, sicut in omnibus divitiis; I have been delighted in thy law, as in all manner of riches. And again,
The law of thy mouth is good for me above thousands of gold and silver. This is the love of God (saith S. John) that we keep his commandment.
And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himself in Deuteronomy witnesseth. This Commandment (saith he) which I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven, that thou shouldst say, Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it us, and cause us to hear it, that we may do it?
Neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou shouldst say Who shall go over the Sea for us, and bring it us? &c. but the word is very near unto thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart for to do it.
Behold (saith Moses) I have set before thee this day life and death, good and evil, in that I command thee this day, to love the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his Commanments, and his Ordinances, and his Laws, that thou mayst live, &c. Neither is it said in vain in S. Matthew: Si vis ad vitam ingredi, ser-va mandata; If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments; and in S. John: Scio quia mandatum ejus vita aeterna est; I know that his Commandment is life everlasting. And if this be the charity of God, or of Men towards God, as S. John hath taught, to wit, that we keep his Commandments; certainly, he is but a liar, that professeth to love God, and neglecteth to observe the word of his Will, with all his Power. And, though I conceive it not in mans ability, without the special grace of God, to fulfil the law (Christ only as man excepted) yet, if we rightly consider the merciful care which God had of his people in those his Commandments, we shall find in our selves, how we borrow liberty, and rather let slip our affections, and voluntarily loosen them from the chains of obedience, to which the Word of God, and Divine Reason hath fastened them, than that we are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our mind (greedy of liberty) proposeth to it self. For, this is the love of God, that we keep his Commandments, and his Commandments are not grievous, 1 Joh. 5. 12.

and if we examine every Precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the balance of our consciences it is not hard for any man to judge, by what easie persuasions, we steal away from our own power, as unwilling to use it against our pleasing desires.

§. XIII.

Of the several Commandments of the Decalogue; and that the difficulty is not in the observing of the Commandments, but by our default.

For by the first, we are commanded to acknowledge, serve, and love one God.
Now, whereby are we enticed to the breach of this Precept? seeing every reasonable man may conceive and know, that an Infinite power cannot be divided into many infinities, and that it is of necessity, that by this Almighty Unity, all things have been caused, and are continued. And if brute Beasts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his Providence he hath also provided for every of them, Which giveth to Beasts their food, &c. there is no doubt, but they would also serve and love him only.

The second Precept is the forbidding of Idolatry, and worship of Images; the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the invention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true, Omnia vult exempla bonis imitari oriuntur, All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keep the memory of men famous for their virtues; until (saith La Fontaine) the Devil crept into them, and (having blotted out the first intent) working in weak and ignorant Souls, changed the nature of the one; and the reason of the other, to serve him thereby. For what reasonable man, if he be not forsaken of God, will call on those blind, deaf, dumb, and dead stocks, more worthless than the most worthless of those, that having life and reason, implore their help, which have neither a yea, or more vile price and baser than the basest of Beasts, who have sense and estimation? For what do we thereby (saith the Wisdom of Solomon) but call so the weak for help, pray to the dead for life, require aid of him that hath no experience, assistance in our journey; of him that cannot go,

and succour in our affairs of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the Block to which he prayeth, be more senseless, David maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like unto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them.

The Branch of the third Commandment, is neither perswaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit; the two greatest in-chainers of mortal men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible disdain of God, unless the hate of good men, and Gods curse be accounted an advantage. For, as our corrupt nature gives us nothing towards it, so can it satiate no one appetite, except everlasting sorrow, and Hell dwell in our desire.
And therefore this strange custom hath the Devil brought up among men, without all subtlety of argument, or cunning persuasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornful advantage over us. For slaughter satisfies hatred, Theft gives satisfaction to need, Adultery to lust, Oppression to covetousness; but this contemptuous offence of blasphemy, and the irreverent abuse of Gods name, as it giveth no help to any of our worldly affections, so the most salvage Nations of the World do not use it.

The fourth Commandment, to keep the Sabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burthen, nor inconvenience. For it giveth rest to the labourer, and consolation to their Masters.
And, that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law: as in Exod. 23. 12. And in the seventh day thou shalt rest; that thine Ox, and thine Ass may rest, and the Son of thy Maid, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The fifth of the second Table, to honor our Parents, with whom we are one and the same, is a gratitude which Nature it self hath taught us towards them, who, after God, gave us life and being, have begotten us, and born us, cherished us in our weak and helpless infancy, and bestowed on us the harvest and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporal and Judicial Ordinances, cursing of Parents, or the offering them violence, was made death.

The next is, That thou shalt not Murder, that is, Thou shalt not do the acts following the affections of hatred. For the Law of God, and after it, our own laws, and in effect, the law of all Nations, have made difference between laughter casual, and furious. Afflicto crimine tuo (saith Braddon) impositum opere tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the work such as it is. And certainly, whosoever cannot forbear to commit Murder, hath neither the grace of God, nor any use of his own will.

The third of the second Table, commands us from Adultery. Now, if the preservation of Virginity have been possible for thousands of Men and Women, who in all Ages have mastered their fleshly desires, and have returned chaste to their Grave; it cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the dilhomour and injury, which we offer to others by such a violation, seeing Marriage is permitted by the Laws of God and men, to all that affect it. And there is no man living, whom the desire of beauty and form hath so constrained, but he might with ease forbear the prosecution of this ill, did not himself give succ to this Infant, and nourish warmth, till it grow to strong heat, heat till it turn to fire, and fire to flame.

The fourth of the second Table, is, That we shall not steal. And, if that kind of violent robbery had been used in Moses time, which many Russians practise now a-days in England, and, to the dishonour of our Nation, more in England, than in any Region of the World among Christians; out of doubt, he would have censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For,
I speak not of the poor and miserable Souls, whom hunger and extreme necessity infor-ceth; but of those detested Thieves, who,
to maintain themselves Lord-like, assault, rob, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and labouring man; or break by violence into other mens houses, and spend in Bravery, Drunkenness and upon Harlots, in one day, what other men have sometime laboured for all their lives; impoverishing whole Families, and taking the bread and food from the mouths of their children. And that this Commandment

Commandment

Commandment might easily be observed, it would soon appear, if Princes would resolve, but for a few years, to pardon none. For, it is the hope of life, and argument of sparing the first offence, that encourageth these Hell-hounds. And if every man presume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Commonwealth, but these men would in a short time impoverish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandment of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witness: from which, if men could not forbear, all surety of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witness, and a false accuser, especially, in matters criminal, that the Law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falsehood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten Commandments, forbiddeth us to covet any thing, which belongeth to another man; either the bodies of their wives for concupiscence, or their goods for desire of gain. And this Precept seemeth the hardest for men to observe; so esteemed by reason of our frail affections; and yet, if we judge hereof rightly, it may be doubted, whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies, and vain thoughts. For, although it be not easy to master all our sudden passions, yet we may restrain and hinder the growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, and seek for grace. How the word Coveting, reacheth to all those, it is to be considered. For, Concupiscentia, according to some, Est effrenatus habendi appetitus; An unbridled, or unrestrained appetite of having: And, as touching such an appetite, we cannot excuse our selves by any our natural frailty, or unadvised error; But, as I suppose, the word Concupiscentia is more largely taken, either for a determinate and unbridled evil intent, or for some arising inclination thereunto. All the question is of the later sort; which is, Actus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione, quæ est principium proprium actus boni aut vitiosi; Such passions, or inclinations are imperfect acts; that is, not deliberated upon by reason, which is the proper Principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, it may seem, that so long as we resist such motions, they harm us not: as they say, Quamdiu refragmur, nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eas dominari permittimus. As long as we give no assent unto them, it is thought by some, that they hurt us not; and that then only they hurt, when we suffer them to bear sway. But these men, as it seems, make nothing forbidden in the tenth Precept; but what hath been forbidden in the other: for in every Commandment, not onely the outward act, but also the inward assent unto evil, though it break not out into act, is forbidden; therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandment and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held; that some are with assent, and unbridled; others bridled, and without assent. For, even so the Moral Philosopher can tell us, that the continent man hath evil desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as, on the other side, the incontinent hath good desires but restrained and suppressed by contrary passions. The evil desires, when they are accompanied with assent, are in every Commandment forbidden, together with the outward act; and therefore, if we will have any thing proper to this Commandment, we must needs say, that the evil desires of the continent man (that is, even those which we resist and bridle) are here forbidden. For though he that bridled his evil desires, be much better than he that yieldeth unto them; yet, such a man according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a virtuous man. For Aristotle himself makes Continents, not to be virtue, but only a degree unto it; confessing, that though the Continent man do well in bridling his evil affections, yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to have them at all. Neither is it much more, that true Divinity delivereth touching this matter. For, as he saith, that in the Continent man the having of these evil desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a virtuous man: so we, that the having of them is a sin. Onely in this we excel him here; that we are able out of Divinity, to give the true reason of this doctrine; which is, that every one sinneth, that doth not love God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the evil desires of the Continent man; that is, of him which bridleth them, must needs be sin: seeing such desires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make us know, that by our faithful endeavours to keep his Commandments, we witness our love toward himself; we may not safely give liberty to our vanities, by casting back upon God (who is Justice it self) that he hath given us Precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandments impossible for us to keep. For, as he is accursed (saith Saint Hierom) that avows that the Law is in all things possible to be observed; so he hath made this addition: Maledictus qui quæ dicitur impossibilia Deum præcipisse; Accursed be they that faith, that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command us to keep the Law; so is our weakness also in the Scriptures laid before us, and therefore it is thus safely to be understood, that we should without evasion, or without betraying of our selves, do our faithful endeavours to observe them: which if we do unfeignedly, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man just, David witnesseth: Enter not in judgment with thy servant, for in thy sight, no flesh that liveth shall be justified. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that sinneth not. And again, Who can say, I have made my heart clean? But seeing there is no sin grievous without deliberation, let every man's conscience judge him, whether he give way willingly, or restrain himself in all that he commands, or no? For when a King gives to his subject a commandment upon pain of loss of his love, to perform some service: if the subject neglecting the same, seek to satisfy his Sovereign with shuffling excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himself to be deceived therein.

§. XIV.

If there were not any Religion, nor Judgment to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.

AND if we consider advisedly; and soberly, of the Moral Law, or ten Commandments, which God by the hand of Moses gave unto his People, it will appear, that such was his merciful Providence in the choice of them, as, were there neither pain nor profit adjoynd to the observing, nor not observing of them; were there no divine power at all, nor any Religion among men; yet, if we did not for our own sakes strive to observe these Laws, all Society of men, and all endeavours, all happiness and contentment in this life would be taken away, and every State, and Common-weal in the World fall to the ground and dissolve. Therefore these Laws were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that every man might enjoy the fruits of his own travel, that right might be done to all men, from all men: that by Justice, Order, and Peace, we might live the lives of reasonable men, and not of Beasts; of free-men, and not of slaves; of civil men, and not of Salvages. And hereof making our humane reason onely Judge, let us see the inconveniences in this life, which would follow by the breach and neglect of these Laws.

As first, what would the issue be, if we acknowledged many gods? would not a far greater hatred, warr, and blood-shed follow, than that which the difference of Ceremony, and diversity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, even among those Nations which acknowledged one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit mankind to pray to Idols, and Images of Gold, Metal, dead Stones, and rotten Wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the loss of time, and an impossibility to receive thence-from, either help or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandment bringeth therewith this disadvantage, and ill to man, that whosoever taketh the Name of God in vain, shall not at any time benefit himself by calling God to witness for him, when he may justly use his Holy Name.

The observing the Sabbath Holy, giveth rest to Men and Beasts, and Nature herself requireth intermission from labour.

If we despise our Parents, who have given us being, we thereby teach our children, to scorn and neglect us, when our aged years require comfort and help at their hands.

If Murder were not forbidden, and severely punished, the race of mankind would be extinguished; and whosoever would take the liberty to destroy others, giveth liberty to others to destroy himself.

If Adultery were lawful, and permitted, no man could say unto himself; This is my Son: there would be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to Posterity, no endeavour by virtue and undertaking to raise Families; murders and poisonings between Man and Wife would be daily committed; and every man subject to most filthy and unclean Diseases.

If Stealth and violent Rapine were suffered, all mankind would shortly after perish, or live as the Salvages, by Roots and Acorns. For no man laboureth but to enjoy the fruits thereof. And such is the mischief of Robbery, as where Moses for lesser crimes, appointed restitution fourfold, policy of State, and necessity, hath made it death.

To permit false Witnesses, is to take all mens lives and estates from them by corruption; the wicked would swear against the virtuous; the waster against the wealthy; the idle Beggar and Loyerer, against the careful and painful Labourer; all trial of right were taken away, and Justice thereby banished out of the World.

The coveting of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of mind, with an inward vexation; for while we covet what appertains to others, we neglect our own: our appetites are therein fed with vain and fruitless hopes, so long as we do but covet; and if we do attain to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the Wives, or goods of our neighbours; we can look for no other, but that our selves shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be deprived of our own.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandments, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the general and particular good of all living? Surely, for our own good, and not in respect of himself, did the most merciful and provident God ordain them; without the observation of which, the virtues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the blessings given us in this life, would be unto us altogether unprofitable, and of no use. For we should remain but in the state of brute Beasts, if not in a far more unhappy condition.

§. X V.

Of humane law, written, and unwritten.

Humane law, of which now it followeth to speak, is first divided into two (viz.) Written, and unwritten. The unwritten consists of usage, approved by time; which Isidore calls Adores; and he defines Adores to be Consuetudines vetustate probatae; to be customs approved by antiquity, or unwritten laws. Now custom differeth from use, as the cause from the effect; in that custom is by use and continuance established into a law; but yet there, where the law is defective, faith Isidore.

And of customs there are two general natures, containing innumerable particulars; the first are written customs, received and exercised by Nations, as the customs of Burgundy and Normandy, the ancient general custom of England, and the customs of Cassile, and other Provinces.

The second are these petty customs, used in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The general or National customs are some written, others unwritten.

The particular or petty customs are seldom written, but witnessed by testimony of the inhabitation. The custom of the Duchie of Cornwall, comprehending also the Stannary of Devon, as touching Tinn, and Tinn causes are written in Devon, but not in Cornwall. But howsoever, use and time hath made these customs as laws, yet ought every custom to be rationalis, as well as prescripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis, quod de jure ab initio non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith Ulpian) quod ab initio viciolum est, non potest tractu temporis convalescere; Course of time avails not that which was naught from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessary in all laws of custom; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law Divine, and Natural; the other, that the cause and reason be strong, proving a right birth, and necessary continuance; it being manifest, that every custom which is against the law, had its beginning from evil deeds, and therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customs of this nature, were but tolerated for a time, by the law-makers, though they have been since continued; because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moved. For, Non sufficit simplex tolerantia. And it is in this sort over-ruled in the law; Res populi consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius qui novam legem et novam constitutionem statuere potest, qui solus princeps est; The people cannot bring in a new custom against law, save by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is only the Prince.

Humane law, generally taken, to wit, humane law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doom of practick reason; by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the law a common precept, the advice of wise men, and the restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calls the law, a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fit for government, and common profit; And more largely, Omne id quod ratione consistit, et illud quod standat with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely, it is thus defined. Humane law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the law natural and eternal; made by the rational discourse of those, that exercise publick authority; prescribing necessary observances to the subject. That every law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying, At tibi lex esse non videtur, quia iusta non fuerit; It seems to be no law at all to me, which is not just; and just it cannot be, except it agree with the law natural and eternal. For there is no law just and legitimate (saith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers have not derived from the eternal. Nihil iustum atque legitimum est, quod non ab aeterna lege sibi homines derivaverunt.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the law natural, to wit, the natural, demonstrable, or needing no demonstration, from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authorized Magistracy; it cannot be doubted, be the government of what kind soever. For it falleth otherwise under the title of those decrees called Violentie, or iniquae constitutiones; Violences, or wicked constitutions.

Of humane law there are four properties, especially answering these four conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawn out of the law of Nature; so every particular of the humane law may be resolved into some principle or rule of the natural.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred unto, and doth respect, the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publick authority.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the law, it prescribeth and directeth all humane actions. And so is the law as large and divers, as all humane actions are divers, which may fall under it. For, according to Thomas, Alia lex Julia de Adulteris, alia Cornelia de Sicariis; The law of Julian against Adultery, is one, the Cornelian against Sicarians, is another. Now, the humane law generally taken, is in respect of these considerations, divided into the law of Nations, and the Civil.

The law of Nations is taken less or more properly; less properly for every law which is not of it self, but from other higher principles deduced; and so it seemeth that Ulpian understands it: for he defineth Jus Gentium, or the law of Nations, to be that which is only common amongst men, as Religion, and the Worship of God; which is not in the very nature of this law of Nations; but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other divine Revelations. But the law of Nations properly taken, is that, dictate, or sentence, which is drawn from a very probable, though not from an evident principle, yet so probable, that all Nations do assent unto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadors be granted between enemies, &c. which National law, according to divers acceptations, and divers considerations had of the humane law, may be sometime taken for a species of the Natural, sometime of the Humane.

Jus civile, or the civil Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in divers Estates it is also divers and peculiar, and this law is not so immediately derived from the law of Nature, as the law of Nations is: For, it is partly deduced out of such principles, as all Nations do not agree in, or easily assent unto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are divers, and do not fit all Estates. Hereof Ulpian, Jus civile neque in totum a Naturali & Gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei servit: itaque cum aliquid addimus, vel detrahimus juri communi, jus proprium, id est, Civile effecimus; The civil Law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the law of Nature and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore, when we add ought to, or take from the law that is common, we make a law proper, that is, the Civil Law.

The law now commonly called the Civil Law, had its birth in Rome; and was first written by the Decem-viri, 303. years after the foundation of the City. It was compounded as well out of the Athenian and other Grecian laws, as out of the ancient Roman customs and laws Regal. The Regal laws were devised by the first Kings, and called Leges Regiae, or Papirianae, because they were gathered by Papirius, Tarquinius then reigning. For, though to many of the former laws as maintained Kingly authority, were abolished with the name; yet those of Servius Tullius, for commerce and contracts, and all that appertained to Religion and common Utility, were continued, and were a part of the laws of the twelve Tables. To these laws of the twelve Tables, were added (as the times gave occasion) those made by the Senatus, called Senatus-consulta: those of the common people, called Plæbe-scita; those of the Lawyers, called Responsa-prudentum; and the Edicts of the Annual Magistrats; which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Julian, and presented to Adrian the Emperor, they were by him confirmed, and made perpetual laws, and the Volume (styled, Edictum perpetuum); as those and the like collections of Justinian afterward were.

The difference antiently between Laws and Edicts, which the French call Reglements, consisted in this, that laws are the Constitutions made or confirmed by Sovereign Authority (be the sovereignty in the People, in a few, or in one) and are withal general and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Justum Magistratus, unless by authority it be made a Law) hath end with the Officer, who made the same, saith Varro. Qui plurimum Edicto tribuunt, legem annum esse dicunt; They who ascribe the most to an Edict, say that it is a law for one year: Though Isidore doth also express by the word Constitutiones or Edicts, those Ordinances called Acts of Prærogatives; as, Constitutio, vel Edictum est quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordain, or proclaim.

Lastly, the humane Law is divided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiastical, or Canon. The Secular commanding temporal good, to wit, the Peace and tranquility of the Common-weal; the Ecclesiastical, the spiritual good, and right government of the Ecclesiastical Common-wealth, or Church: Mund nature legem, hoc divinum spectat; That respects the law of Nature, this the Law of God. And so may Jus Civile be taken two ways; First, as distinguished from the law of Nations, as in the first division: Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and diverse from the Ecclesiastical. But this division of the School-men is obscure. For although the Civil be the same with the Secular, as the Civil is a law, yet the Secular is more general, and comprehendeth both the Civil, and all other laws not Ecclesiastical. For of Secular laws in use among Christian Princes, and in Christian Common-wealths, there are three kinds; the Civil, which hath every where a voice, and is in all Christian Estates (England excepted) most powerful; the laws of England, called Common, and the laws of custom, or Provincial. In Spain, besides the law Civil, they have the customs of Castile, and other Provinces. In France, besides the Civil, the customs of Burgundy, Bleis, Berri, Nivernois, and Lodunois, &c. Tous lieux, sites & usages en Lodunois, &c. seront gouvernez selon les costumes du dit pays; all places lying within the precincts of Lodunois, shall be governed according to the customs of that place. There are also in France the customs of Normandy, and these of two kinds; General, and Local; and all purged and reformed by divers Acts of the three Estates. The Charters of confirmation of these ancient customs, before and since their reformation have these words: Nor autem Registrum predictum, usus laudabilis, & consuetudines antiquas, &c. laudamus, approbamus, & autoritate Regia confirmamus; The Register aforesaid, laudable use, and ancient customs, we praise, approve, and by our Kings Authority confirm. The Common Law of England is also compounded of the ancient customs of the same, and of certain Maxims by those customs of the Realm approved. Upon which customs also are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

These ancient customs of England have been approved by the Kings thereof from Age to Age: as that custom by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, diseised, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the Law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient custom of England, that the eldest Sons should inherit without partition. In Germany, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland, it is the custom of all Lands (that have not been resigned into the Kings hands) that the eldest of the House shall enjoy the Inheritance during his own life; and so the second and third eldest (if there be so many brothers) before the Heir in lineal descent; this is called the custom of Tanistry. For example, if a Lord of Land have four Sons, and the eldest of those four have also a Son, the three brothers of the eldest Son shall, after the death of their brother, enjoy their Fathers Lands before the grandchild: the custom being grounded upon the reason of necessity. For the Irish in former times, having always lived in a subdivided civil War, not onely the greatest against the greatest, but every Baron and Gentleman one against another, were enforced to leave successors of age and ability, to defend their own Territories. Now, as in Normandy, Burgundy, and other Provinces of France, there are certain peculiar and petty Customs, besides the great and general custom of the Land, so are there in England, and in every part thereof. But the greatest bulk of our Laws, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament; Laws propounded and approved by the three Estates of the Realm, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of which, all men are therefore bound, because they are Acts of choice, and self-desire. Leges nulla alia causa nos tenent, quam quod judicio populi recepte sunt; The Laws do therefore bind the Subject, because they are received by the judgment of the Subject. Tum demum humane leges habent vim suam, cum fuerint non modo instituta, sed etiam firmate approbatione communitatis; It is then that humane laws have their strength, when they shall not onely be devised, but by the approbation of the People confirmed.

And so saltneth these properties to every Christian Law, that the same be honest, that it be possible, that it be according to Nature, and according to the custom of the Country; also for the time and place, convenient, profitable, and manifest; and without respect of private profit, that it be written for the general good. He also gives four effects of the Law, which Modestinus comprehends in two; to wit, obligation, and infatigation: the former binds us by fear, to avoid vice; the later encourageth with hope, to follow virtue. For, according to Cicero, Legem oportet esse vitiorum emendatricem, utrimque commendat utrimque virtutem: It behooveth the Law to be a mender of Vices, and a commender of Vertue. The part obligatory, or binding us to the observation of things commanded, or forbidden, is an effect common to all laws; and it is two-fold; the one constraineth us by fear of our consciences, the other by fear of external punishment. These two effects the Law performeth, by the exercise of those two powers, to wit, Coactive and Directive.

The second of these two effects remembered by Modestinus, is Infatigation, or incouragement to Vertue, as Aristotle makes it the end of the Law, to make men virtuous. For laws being such as they ought to be, do both by prescribing and forbidding, urge us to well-doing; laying before us the good and the evil, by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmative commanding good, and power negative forbidding evil, are those into which the law is divided, as touching the matter: and in which David comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof: saying, Declina a malo, & fac bonum, Decline from evil, and do good.

§. XVI.

That onely the Prince is exempt from humane laws, and in what sort.

NOW, whether the power of the humane Law be without exception of any person, it is doubtfully disputed among those that have written of this subject, as well Divines as Lawyers; and namely, whether Sovereign Princes be compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the Law, as aforesaid; the one Directive, the other Coactive: to the power Directive they ought to be subject, but not to that which constraineth. For, as touching violence, or punishments, no man is bound to give a pre-judicial judgment against himself; and, if equals have not any power over each other, much less have inferiours over their superiours, from whom they receive their authority and strength.

And speaking of the supreme power of Laws, simply then is the Prince so much above the laws, as the Soul and Body united, is above a dead and senseless Carcase. For the King is truly called, Jus vivum, & lex animata: An animate, and living law. But this is true, that by giving authority to laws, Princes both add greatness to themselves, and conserve it; and therefore was it said of Brañon out of Justinian; Merito debet Rex tribuere legi quod lex attribuit ei: nam

lex facit ut ipse sit Rex; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the law, which the law first attributeth to the King; for it is the law that doth make Kings.

But whereas Brañon ascribeth this power to the humane Law, he is therein mistaken. For Kings are made by God, and laws divine; and by humane laws onely, declared to be Kings. As for the places remembered by the Divines and Lawyers, which infer a kind of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of virtuous Princes, who are to give an account of their actions to God onely.

Thi soli peccavi, saith David; against thee onely have I sinned; therefore the Prince cannot be said to be subject to the law; Principes non subijcitur legi. For seeing, according to the School-men, the law humane, is but quoddam organum, & instrumentum potestatis gubernative: non videtur posse ejus obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa potestatis humana non pertinet; sed vis potestatis humane non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo, neque lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia adiva, est principium transmutandi aliud; Seeing humane law (say they) is but a kind of organ, or instrument of the power that governeth, it seems that it cannot extend it self to bind any one, whom no humane power can control, or lay hold of: but the Governour himself, in whom the governing power doth reside, as a person that cannot by himself, or by his own power, be controlled. And therefore the law which is made by such a power, cannot bind the Law-maker himself: for every adiva ability, is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it self resides. And seeing Princes have power to deliver others from the obligation of the law; Ergo, etiam potestatem Principes, sive Legislator sua se voluntate prohibito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince, or Law-maker, at his own will and pleasure, deliver himself from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded: Subditi tenentur leges observare necessitate coactionis. Principes vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communis; The subjects are bound to fulfill the Law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince only by his own will, and regard of the common good.

Now, concerning the political laws, given by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a President, from which no civil Institutions of other People should presume to digress, I will not presume to determine, but leave it as a question on for such men to decide, whose professions give them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirm, That we ought not to seem wiser than God himself, who hath told us, that there are no laws frighteous, as those which it pleased him to give to his Elect People to be governed by. True it is, that all Nations have their several qualities, wherein they differ, even from their next borderers, no less than in their peculiar Languages; which disagreeable conditions to govern aptly, one and the same law very hardly were able. The Roman civil laws did indeed contain in order a great part of the then known World, without any notable inconvenience, after such time as once it was received and become familiar; yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yielded much unto the natural customs of the sundry people which it governed. For, whether it be through a long continued persuasion; or (as Affrologers more willingly grant) some influence of the Heavens; or, peradventure, some temper of the soil and climate, affording matter of provocation to vice (as plenty make the Sybarites luxurious; want, and opportunity to steal; makes the Arabians to be Thieves), very hard it were to forbid by Law, an offence so common with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from just and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdom of Congo unhappily diverted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first embraced, but after, with great fury rejected, because plurality of Wives was denied unto them, I know not how necessarily, but more conscientiously than seasonably. In such cases, methinks it were not amiss to consider, that the high God himself permitted some thing to the Israelites, rather in regard of their natural disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant unto the ancient Rules of the first perfection. So, where even the general nature of man doth condemn (as many things it doth) for wicked and unjust; there may the law, given by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the evil, which forceth man, as near as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custom hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habit, with so long and so publick approbation, that the virtue opposing it would seem as uncouth, as it were to walk naked in England, or to wear the English fashion of apparel in Turkey; there may be a wife and upright Law-giver, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses law required; even as the good King Hezekiah did, in a matter merely Ecclesiastical; and therefore the less capable of dispensation, praying for the people; The good Lord be mercifull unto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seek the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary; which Prayer the Lord heard and granted.

To this effect it is well observed by Mr. Doctor Willet, that the moral Judicials of Moses do partly bind, and partly are let free. They do not hold affirmatively, that we are tied to the same severity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatively they do hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adjudged, where sentence of death is given by Moses; Christian Magistrates ruling under Christ the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the severity of Moses law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot add unto it, to make the burthen more heavie: for to shew more rigour than Moses, becometh not the Gospel.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath been the subject of many learned discourses, neither will I take upon me, to speak any thing definitively in a case which dependeth still in some controversy among worthy Divines. Thus much (as in honour of the Judicial law, or rather of him that gave it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath always been very plausible. And surely, howsoever they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a general and onely law; yet shall we hardly find any other ground, wheron the conscience of a Judge may rest, with equal satisfaction in making interpretation, or giving sentence upon doubts arising out of any law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Judge could have been witness, of whom Fortescue, that notable Bulwark of our laws, doth speak, complaining of a judgment given against a Gentlewoman at Salisbury, who being accused by her own man, without any other proof, for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the man who accused her, within a year after, being convicted for the same offence, confessed that his Mistress was altogether innocent of that cruel fact, whose terrible death he then (though over-late) grievously lamented; but this Judge, saith the same Author, Scipius ipse mihi falsus est, quod nunquam in vita sua animam ejus de hoc facto ipse purgaret; He himself often confessed unto me, that he should never, during his life, be able to clear his his conscience of that fact. Wherefore, that acknowledgment which other Sciences yield unto the Metaphysicks, that from thence are drawn Propositions, able to prove the principles of Sciences, which out of the Sciences themselves cannot be proved, may justly be granted by all other polittick institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more justly, by how much the subject of the Metaphysicks which is, Ens quatenus Ens; being as it is beings; is infinitely inferior to the Ens Entium; The Being of beings, tho onely good, the Fountain of Truth, whose clear is the beginning of Wisdom. To which purpose, well saith Saint Augustine, Conditor legum temporalium si vir bonus est, & sapiens, illam ipsam consulit aeternam, de qua nulli anime judicare datum est; The Author of temporal Laws, if he be good and wise, doth therein consult the Law eternal, to determine of which, there is no power given to any soul. And as well Prince Edward, in Forseigne his Discourse, Nemo potest melius, an aliud fundamentum ponere, quam posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better, or another foundation, than the Lord hath laid.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiving of the Law, to the death of Moses.

S. I.

Of the inhabiting and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wilderness; with a note of the reverence given to the Worship of God, in this ordering of their troops.

Vhen Moses had received the Law from God, and published it among the People, and finished the Tabernacle of the Ark, and Sanctuary; he mustered all the Tribes and Families of Israel; and having seen what number of Men fit to bear Arms, were found in every Tribe, from twenty years of age upwards; he appointed unto them, by direction from the LORD, such Princes and Leaders, as in Worth and Reputation were in every Tribe most eminent. The number of the whole Army was 603550. able men for the Wars, besides Women and Children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Egypt. This great Army was divided by Moses into four grofs and mighty Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able Men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their number, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Issachar and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600. fighting men, led by Nassion; in Issachar, 54400. led by Nathaniel; in Zabulon 57400. led by Eliab. All these marched under the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vant-guard, and was the first that moved and marched, being lodged and quartered at their general encamping on the East-side of the Army, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second Battalion or Army, called in the Scriptures, the host of Reuben, had joynted unto it Simen and Gad, in number, 151450. All which marched under the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. under Eliazar; in Simen, 59300. under shelumiel; in Gad, 45650. under Eliaph. These had the second place, and encamped on the South-side of the Tabernacle.

The third Army marched under the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were joynted the Regiment of Manasse and Benjamin; who joynted together, made in number 108100. able men. These marched in the third place, encamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. under Eliabana; Manasse 32000. under Garniel; Benjamin 35400. under Abidam.

The fourth and last Army, or Squadron, of the general Army, containing 157600. able men, marched under the Standard of Dan; to whom were joynted the two Tribes of Nephthali and Asser. And these had the Rere-ward, and moved last, encamping on the North-side. Dan had 62700. under Abiezzer; Asser 41500. under Pagiel; Nephthali 53400. under Abira.

Besides these Princes of the several Tribes, there were ordained Captains over Thousands, over Hundreds, over Fifties, and over rather to fetch away his Family, and to take his leave of his own Country, by setting things in order, than to abide there.

§. III.

The Voyage from Horeb to Kades; the Mutinies by the way; and the cause of their turning back to the Red Sea.

After this dismissal of Hobab, Israel began to march towards the desarts of Paran; and after three days wandering, they sat down at the sepulchres of lust, afterward called Tabera, or Incesio; by reason that God consumed with fire those Mutineers and Murrmurers, which rose up in this remove, which happed about the 23. day of the same Moneth. And from this 23. day of the second Moneth of the second year, they rested, and fed themselves with Quails (which it pleased God by a Sea-wind to cast upon them) to the 24. day of the third Moneth; to wit, all the Moneth of Sinan, or June; whereof fursuiting there died great numbers; from whence in the following Moneth, called Thamus, answering to our July, they went on to Hase-roth, where Miriam the sister of Moses was stricken with the leprosie, which continued upon her seven days, after whose recovery Israel removed toward the border of Idumaea, and encamped at Rithma, near Kades Barnea, from whence Moses sent the twelve discoverers into the Territory of Canaan, both to inform themselves of the fertility and strength of the Country; as also to take knowledge of the ways, passages, rivers, fords and Mountains. For *Ara*d, King of the Canaanites, surprized divers companies of the Israelites, by lying in ambush near those ways, through which the discoverers and searchers of the Land had formerly past. Now, after the return of the discoverers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel; whose ingratitude and rebellion after his so many benefits, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their deliverance from the Egyptian slavery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible Wilderness (for so Moses calleth it) with the Victory which he gave them against the powerful Amalekites, to be no other than the effects of his hatred, thinking that he led them on, and preserved them, but to bring them, their Wives and Children to be slaughtered, and given for a prey and spoile to the Amorites, or Canaanites. For, it was reported unto them by the searchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong Towers and Castles, that many of the people were Giant-like (for they confest that they saw the Sons of Anac there) who were men of fearful stature, and so far over-topped the Israelites, as they appeared to them and to themselves, but as Grasshoppers in their respect. Now, as this mutiny exceeded all the rest, wherein they both accused God, and consulted to choose them a Captain (or as they call it now aday, an Elefio) to carry them back again into Egypt; so did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguished every Soul of the whole multitude (Joshua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promises, persuaded the people to enter Canaan, being then near it; and at the mountain foot of Idumaea, which is but narrow; laying before them the fertility thereof, and assuring them of Victory. But as men whom the passion of fear had bereaved both of reason and common sense, they threatened to stone these encouragers to death; accompting them as men either desperate in themselves, or betrayers of the lives, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God resisted these wicked purposes, and interposing the fear of his bright glory between the unadvised fury of the multitude, and the innocence & constancy of his servants, preserved them thereby from their violence; threatening an entire destruction of the whole Nation, by sending among them a consuming and merciless Pestilence. For this was the tenth insurrection and rebellion, which they had made, since God delivered them from the slavery of the Egyptians. But Moses (the mildest or meekest of all men) prayed unto God to remember his infinite mercies; alleging, that this so severe a judgment, how deservedly soever inflicted, would increase the pride of the heathen Nations, and give them occasion to vaunt, that the God of Israel failing in power to perform his promises, suffered them to perish in these barren and fruitless Desarts. Yet, as God is no less just than merciful, as God is slow to anger, so is his wrath a consuming fire; the same being once kindled by the violent breath of man's ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand less heave than hoped for, he scourged this iniquity; so by the measure of his glory (ever more jealous of neglect and derision) he suffered not the wicked to pass unpunished; reserving his compassion for the innocent; whom, because they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleased to preserve, and in them to perform his promises, which have never been frustrate.

§. IV.

§. IV.

Of their unwillingness to return; with the punishment thereof; and of divers accidents in the return.

Now, when Moses had revealed the purposes of God to the People, and made them know his heave displeasure towards them, they began to bewail themselves, though over-late; the times of grace and mens repentance, having also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often plaid and dallied with his merciful sufferings, they would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt, and make offer to enter the Land, contrary again to the advice of Moses; who assured them that God was not among them; and that the Ark of his Covenant should not move, but by his direction, who could not err; and that the Enemies sword, which God had hitherto bended, and rebated, was now left no less sharp than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites and Canaanites; no less cruel. But as men from whom God hath withdrawn his Grace, do always follow those counsels which carry them to their own destructions: so the Hebrews, after they had forsaken the opportunity by God and their Conductors offered: and might then have entered Judea before their Enemies were prepared and joyned; did afterward, contrary to Gods Commandment, undertake the enterprise of themselves, and ran head-long, and without advice, into the Mountains of Idumaea. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being joyned, and attending their advantage, set on them, brake them, and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victory and perute, consumed them all the way of their flight, even unto Hormah: the Amalekites, in revenge of their former loss, and overthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites, to prevent their displacement and destruction threatened. Of which powerful assembly of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with their neighbour Kings, joined together for their common safety) it pleased God to forewarn Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended: For he commanded him to return by those painful passages of the Desarts, through which they had formerly travelled, till they found the banks of the Red Sea again; in which retreat, before they came back to pass over

Jordan, there were consumed eight and thirty years; and the whole number of the 600. and odd thousand, which came out of Egypt (Moses, Joshua, and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wilderness, the stubborn and careless generations were wholly worn out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000. and more. For, besides the double fault, both of refusing to enter the Land upon the return of their discoverers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Moloch, and the Host of Heaven. For, although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipped the Sun and Moon in after-times, it is proved out of sundry other places.

Now, after the broken Companies were returned to the Camp at Cades, Moses, according to the commandment received from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recover the shores of the Red Sea. And so from Cades, or Rithma, he removed to Remmonparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found, and divided among them. From whence he went on to Lihnah, taking that name of the Frankincense there found. From Lihnah he crossed the Valley, and sat down at Reffia, near the foot of the Mountain. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and encamped at Ceclata; where one of the Hebrews, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses always keeping the Valley, between two great legdes of Mountains (those which bound the Desart of Sin, and those of Pharan) cross'd the same from Ceclata, and marched Eastward to the Mountain of Sapher, or Sepher; this making the twentieth Mansion. From thence he passed on to Harada; then to Maceloth; and then to Thabab, and so to Thara, or Thare; the four and twentieth Mansion. Where Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; who, for their contempt of God and his Ministers, were some of them swallowed up alive, and by the earth, opening her mouth, devoured; others, even two hundred and fifty which offered Incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from Heaven; and 14700. of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest marvels and judgments of God that hath been shewed in all the time of Moses his Government, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men, who would have usurped Ecclesiastical authority, were suddenly swallowed up alive into the Earth, with their Families and goods; even while they sought to overthrow the Order, Discipline, and Power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the government both of his Church, and Common-wealth of his People. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirm them, it pleased him in this place also to approve by miracle the former election of his servant Aaron, by the 12. Rods given by the Heads of the 12. Tribes; of which Moses received one of every Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which, being all withered and dried Wands, and on every Rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aaron's on that of Levi, it pleased God, that the Rod of Aaron received, by his power, a vegetable spirit, and having lain in the Tabernacle of the Congregation before the Ark one night, had on it both Buds, Blossoms, and ripe Almonds.

From Tharab, the whole Army removed to Meltraz, and thence to Esfongaber, thence to Mojeroth (or Masjir, after S. Hierom) and from Mojeroth to Benjancan, and so to Gadgad, which Hierom calleth Gadgad; thence to Jetabata, the thirtieth Mansion; where, from certain fountains of water gathered in one, Adricomius maketh a River, which falleth into the Red Sea, between Madian, and Esfongaber.

Now, although it be very probable, that at Esfongaber, where Solomon furnished his Fleet for the East-India, there was store of fresh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great River in Arabia the Stony, which he calleth Corys, from whence (saith he) the Inhabitants convey water in Pipes of Leather to other places, by which device the King of Arabia relieved the Army of Cambyses; yet is Adricomius greatly deceived; as many times he is, in finding these Springs at Gadgad, or Jetabata, being the nine and twentieth, or thirtieth Mansion. For it was at Punon, that those Springs are spoken of, which in Deuteronomy the tenth, and the seventh Verse, is also called Jetabata, or Jobath, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the River Zared, the next adjoining. And that these Springs should fall into the Red Sea at Esfongaber, or Eloth, I cannot believe, for the way thither is very long. And this I find in Belonius, that there are divers Torrents of fresh water in those sandy parts of Arabia; which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunk up by the hot and thirsty sand, before they can recover the banks of the Red Sea.

From Jetabata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and encamped at Hebron, & from thence to Esfongaber; which City in Josephus time, had the name of Berenice; and in Hierom's, Effla. From thence, keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, he turned towards the North, as he was by God commanded; Esfongaber being the farthest place towards the South-East, that Moses travelled in that passage.

It seemeth that Esfongaber, or Asiongaber, Eloth and Madian, were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is said, That the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in the Mount Hor, near the coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumaea. And if Esfongaber, and the other places near the Red Sea, had at this present been subject unto the Idumaeans, Moses would also have demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumaeans obtained those places: for it is said; And they arose out of Midian, and came to Paran, and took men with them; which were in those Companies that followed young Adad of Idumaea into Egypt, when he fled from Jobab. Likewise it is said of Solomon, that he made a Navie of Ships in Esfongaber, besides Eloth, in the Land of Edom.

S. V.

Of Moses arrival at Zin Kades: and of the accidents while that they abode there.

From Esfongaber he turned again towards the North, and pitched in the Wilderness of Zin, which is Kades, or in Bereth, of the children of Isacah; where they late down in the first Month of the fourth year, after they left Egypt. For, at the next Mansion, Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Month of the fourth year; the nine and thirtieth year taking end at Esfongaber. And at this City of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or near it, died Miriam, or Mary, Moses sister, whose Sepulcher was to be seen in S. Hierom's time, as himself avoweth. From hence, ere they departed to the Mountain Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heaven; by being devoured and swallowed up by the Earth; by the sudden Pestilence, which often seized them; nor any any miracle formerly shewing, either the love or wrath of God, could prevail with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in every of their appetites; but in stead of seeking for help and relief at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting ungratefully on Moses all their misadventures; yea, though they well knew that their own fathers had left their bodies in the Deserts, and they were now entered into the fortieth year, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in sight of the Land promised, they again as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God are without beginning; so his mercies being without end, he commanded Moses to strike a Rock adjoining, with his Rod, and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattle were satisfied. Nevertheless, because God perceived a kind of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron at this place; therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might invite them. But it pleased him to end the travels of Aaron at the Mountain Hor, being the next, and the four and thirtieth Station. At which Mountain Hor, Aaron was depouled of the garments of his Priesthood, and the same put on Eleazar his Son, as God hath commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountain; but God received Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more seen.

Of this Mountain called Hor, otherwise Mosera, as in Deut. 10. vers. 6. those Horites took name, which the Idumaeans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the seven and twentieth Mansion; and Mosera, which they write Moseroth, for difference, which was the four and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places; because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards Esfongaber, encamped at Mosera, after he departed from Hebron, and before he came to Benjancan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came unto after he had left Cades, where Miriam, Moses sister, died; the first being the seven and twentieth, and the second being the four and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mosera, it should have been written, Hor juxta Mosera; Hor near Mosera; for it is but one root of a Mountain, divided into divers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: Whereof the West part Moses calleth Mosera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses encamped, as he past towards the Red-Sea on his left hand; by the East part, as he went back again North-wards towards Moab, as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceive.

Now, it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent messengers to the Prince of Idumaea, paying him that he might pass with the people of Israel through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the nearest way of all other from the City of Kades, where Moses then encamped; whereas otherwise, taking his journey by the Rivers of Zared, Arnon and Jordan, he might have run into many hazards in the passage of those Rivers, the far way about, and the many powerful Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now, the better to persuade the Prince of Idumaea hereunto, Moses remembered him, that he was of the same Race and Family with Isaac, calling him by the name of Brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the Sons of one father, to wit, Isaac; referring thereby, that he had more reason to favour and respect them, than he had to assist the Canaanites; against whom, Esau his Ancestor had made War, and driven out the Horites (who were of their ancient Races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his own name, Edom, or Idumaea. He also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, & of his purposes, and promises assured Edom, or the King thereof that he would no way offend his people, or waste his Country, but that he would restrain his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high ways; paying money for whatsoever he used, yea, even for the water, which themselves or their cattle should drink. For Moses was commanded by God, not to provoke the children of Esau, But the King of Idumaea knowing the strength of his own Country, the same being near Canaan, rampir'd with high and sharp mountains; and withal suspecting, as a natural wise man, that 600000. strangers being once entered his Country, it would rest in their wills to give him law, resolvedly refused them passage, and delivered this answer to the Messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible means. And not knowing whether such a denial might satisfy or exasperate, he gathered the strength of his Country together, ther, and shewed himself prepared to defend their passage. For, as it is written, Numb. 20. Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses understanding, that the end of his enterprise was not the conquest of Seir, or Idumaea, and that the Land promised, was that of Canaan: like unto himself, who was of natural understanding the greatest of any man, and the skilfullest man of War that the World had, he refused to adventure the Army of Israel against a Nation, which being overcome, gave but a passage to invade others; and which, by reason of the feat of their mountainous Country, could not but have endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendered them less able, if not altogether powerless, to have conquered the rest.

§. VI.

Of their compassing Idumaea, and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

HE therefore leaving the way of Idumaea, turned himself towards the East, and marched towards the Desarts of Moab. Which, when Arad the King of the Canaanites understood, and that Moses had blanch'd the way of Idumaea; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, he thought it safest, rather to find his enemies in his neighbours Country, than to be found by them in his own; which he might have done with a far greater hope of victory, had Moses been enforced first to have made his way by the Sword through Idumaea, and thereby, though victorious, greatly have lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet, being resolved to make trial, that courage the Israelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came nearer his own home; leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Desert, he set upon some part of the Army; which, for the multitude occupied a great space, and for the many herds of cattle that they drove with them, could not encamp so near together, but that some quarter or other was evermore subject to surprize. By which advantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance unexpected, he slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now, it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessor, which joined his forces with the Amalekites, and gave an overthrow to those mutinous Israelites, which, without direction from God by Moses, would have entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it seemeth, that the greatest number of that Army were of the Canaanites, because in the first of Deuteronomy 44. the Amorites are named alone, without the Amalekites, and are said to have beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the same that had a victory over Israel, near Cadesbarne; or if it were his Predecessor that then prevailed; this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to be invaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to pass Moab, determined, while he was yet in the Desert, to try the quarrel. And whereas it followeth in the third Verse of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites utterly destroyed the Canaanites, and their Cities, they are much mistaken that think, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be understood, to have been done in the future, to wit, in the time of Joshua. For, had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, he would not have fallen back again into the Desarts of Zin and Moab, and have fetch'd a wearisome and needless compass, by the Rivers of Zared and Arnon.

Neither is their conjecture to be valued at any thing, which affirm, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it self; but that his Territory lay without it, and near to the Mountain Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt; which South part of Canaan, was the North part of Edom.

Again, Horma (for so far the Israelites, after their victory, pursued the Canaanites) is seated in the South of Judea. There is also a City of that name in Simon. But there is no such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed presently after the repetition of this Victory, it were enough to prove, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Joshua his time, and not at the instant of Arad's assault. For, had the Israelites at this time sack'd the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day have complained for want of Water and Bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also Water and Bread. But it was in the time of Joshua, that the Israelites took their revenge, and after they had pass'd Jordan; Joshua then governing them, who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the

the name of his City so called; and with him the King of Horma; to which place the Israelites pursued the Canaanites. And he named them amongst those Kings, which he vanquished, and put to death.

Now, after this assault, and surprize by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, he led the people Eastward to compass Idumaea, and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plains of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a Desert was terrible, began again to rebel against their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whose Venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentiful grace, cured them again by their beholding an artificial Serpent, by his commandment set up.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leaving the ordinary way which lyeth between the Red Sea and Celafozia, encamped at Zalmona; and thence he removed to Phunon, where he erected the Brazen Serpent; making these journeys by the edge of Idumaea, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principal City of the Edomites. Now, where it is written in Numb. 21.4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the people; it was not thereby meant, that the Israelites turned back towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Fonsca) per viam qua habet à latere mare rubrum: By the way that sided the Red Sea, but indeed they cross'd and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Tracennitis, and the Countreys of Moab, to the Red Sea, that is, to Esgongaber, Eloth, and Midian; which way, as it lay North and South, so Israel, to shun the border of Edom, and to take the utmost East part of Moab, cross'd the common way towards the East, and then they turned again towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth, where he entred the Territory of Moab, adjoining to the Land of Suph, a Country bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Abarim, the eight and thirtieth Mansion, that is, where the Mountains so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mountures of Hills, on the East border of Moab; from thence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the River of Zared, which riseth in the Mountains of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not far from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And having pass'd that River, they lodged at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblabthaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Hieremy the Prophet, Chap. 48. Vers. 22. calleth the House of Diblabthaim, the same which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nebuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the River Arnon, and encamped in the Mountains of Abarim; though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Helmondiblabthaim, but speaketh of his remove from the River of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon; calling Arnon the border of Moab, between them and the Amorites; speaking as he found the state of the Country at that time. For Arnon was not antiently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, King of the Amorites; even from the Predecessor of Balac Peor then reigning. From Diblabthaim, Moses sent messengers to Sehon, King of the Amorites, to desire a passage through his Country; which, though he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to give a reason to the neighbour Nations of the War he undertook. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Sehon, observed the same precept which he left to his Posterity and Successors, for a law of the War; namely, in Deut. 20. 10. In these words; When thou comest near unto a City to fight against it, thou shalt offer it peace; which if it do accept of, and open unto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries unto thee, and serve thee; but if it refuse, &c. then shalt smite all the males thereof with the edge of the sword. Which ordinance all Commanders of armies have observed to this day, or ought to have done.

§. VII.

Of the Book of the battels of the Lord, mentioned in this Story, and of other Books mentioned in Scripture, which are lost.

NOW, concerning the War between Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to refer a great part of this Story to that Book, entitled, Liber bellorum Domini; The book of Gods battels: and therefore passeth over many encounters, and other things memorable, with greater brevity in this place. His words, after the Geneva Translation, are these: Wherefore it shall be spoken in the book of the battels of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar Copy differeth not in sense from this: But the Greek Septuagint vary. For the Greek writes it to this effect; For thus it is said in the book: The Warr of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zoob, and the brooks of Arnon. Junius for the Red Sea, which is in the Genevean and vulgar Edition, names the Region of Suph, a Country bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he conjectureth. 4. || 2. The Text, he readeth thus. Idcirco dici solet in recessione bellorum Jchove, contra Vahebum in Regione Suph; & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis; Therefore it is spoken respecting of the battels of Jchovah, against Vaheb in the Country of Suph, and against the Rivers, the Rivers of Arnon. In which words he understands, that amongst the Warrs which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memory in the mouth of most men, concerning the Warr of Sehon against Vaheb, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Country near Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vaheb was the immediate Predecessor of Balac, who lived with Moses; though it be written that this Balac was the Son of Zippor, and not of Vaheb. For, it seems (as it is plain in the succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdoms were elective, and not successive. And as Junius in this Translation understandeth no special Book of the battels of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any special Book be meant; and if any, whether it be not a prediction of Wars in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the book of Judges. Syracides, cap. 46. tells us plainly, that those battels of the Lord were fought by Joshua; Who was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battels of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often pass over matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other books written of the same matter at large; therefore it seemeth probable, that such a book as this there was; wherein the several victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with divine discourse, have perished in the long race of time, or have been destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrates. For the Books of Honob, howsoever they have been in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembered in an Epistle of Thaddeus, and cited by Origen, as ἀρχαία, and by Tertullian.

That work also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Books remembered by Joshua, Chap. 10. Vers. 13. and in the second of Samuel, Chap. 1. Vers. 18. called the Book of Jasher, or Justorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sun and Moon in the midst of the Heavens is recorded, and how they stood still till Israel had avenged themselves of their enemies; out of which also David took the Precept of teaching the Children of Judah, to exercise their Bows against their Enemies.

Some think this to be the Book of eternal Predestination; in which the just are written, according unto the fixty and ninth Psalm, Vers. 28. where it is said; Let them be put out of the book of Life, neither let them be written with the Righteous. Hieron thinks that David by this Book, understood those of Samuel; Rabbi Solomon, that the Books of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the just Abraham, of Isaac, of Jacob, and Moses are written. Others, that it is was the Book of Exodus. Others, as Theodore, that it was a Commentary upon Joshua, by an unknown Author.

The Book of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembered in the second of Chron. Chap. 33. v. 18. and 19. Of this Book, also lost, Hieron conceives, that the Prophet Esay was the Author.

The same mischance came as well to the Story of Solomon, written by Abia Silonites, who met with Jeroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdom of Israel from the Son of Solomon: As to the Books of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Jedro the Seer, remembered in the second of Chron. Chap. 9. Vers. 29. With these have the Books of Semataab and of Iddo, remembered in the second of Chron. Chap. 12. Vers. 15. perished; and that of Jehi the Son of Hanani, of the acts of Jehoshaphat, cited in the second of Chron. Chap. 20. Vers. 34. Also that Book of Solomon, which the Hebrews write Hagirim, of 5000. Verses, of which, that part called Canticum Canticorum, only remaineth, 1 Kings 4. 32. and with this, divers others of Solomon's works have perished, as his Book of the natures of Trees, Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1 Kings 4. 33. with the remembered by Origen, Josaphat, Hieron, Cedrenus, Ciccius Asplanus, Picus Mirandula, and others.

Of these, and other Books many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nebuchadnezzar burnt the Temple of Jerusalem. But let us return thither where we left.

§. VIII.

of Moses his sparing the issue of Lot; and of the Giants in those parts; and of Sehon and Og.

When Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposite to the City of Nibo; leaving the City of Midian on the left hand, and attempting nothing upon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabit on the South-side of Arnon, having lost all his antient and best Territory, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to provoke them to battle, God having given that Land to the children of Lot; the same which was antiently possessed by the Emims, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the sons of Anac.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zanukumims. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Jordan, even to the Desert of Arabia, as well on the West, as on the East-side of the Mountains of Gilead, was inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Israelites did not at any time pass those Mountains to the East of Basan, but left their Country to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We find also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the flood: so these Nations, which antiently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it self, had among them many Families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the City of Arbab, which Arbab in Joshua is called the father of the Anakims; and the greatest man of the Anakims. There had also been Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims; and their chief City was Aroer or Ar, near the River of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gave the name of Zanukumims; which were of the same antient Canaanites: and their chief City was Kalba, afterward Philadelpia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Viri robusti, horrendique Gigantes; strong men, and fearful Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Hom, in the same Province, and not far to the North of Aroer.

Now Moses having past Arnon, and being incamped at Abarim; and having (as before) sent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a passage through his Country, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former conquest upon Isabel the Moabites; which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as strangers and usurpers, (themselves being of the sons of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way; and withal, prepared to encounter Moses with as much speed as he could, because Moses incamped in the Country of his new conquests, to wit, the Plains of Moab, the two and fortieth and last Manition: which Moses waisted with the multitude of his people and cattel. Towards him therefore halting himself, they encountered each other at Jubas: where Sehon with his children and people were broken and discomfited, and the victory so pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. He also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Essebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Basan also were, and descended of Emoreus, or Amoreus: for Moses calleth the Basanites also Amorites. And although Israel might now have taken a ready way and passage into Judea, being at this time, and after this victory, at the banks of Jordan: yet he knew it to be perillous to leave so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his back, as inhabited all the Region of Basan, or Tracornitis: and therefore he led on his Army to invade Og, a person of exceeding strength and stature, and the only man of mark remaining of the antient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60 Cities walled and defended: lying between the Mountain of Hermion (which Mountain, saith Moses, the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites, Shenir) and the River of Jordan. And it befell unto the King of Basan (who attended Moses coming at Edrei) as it did unto Sehon: for he and his sons perished, and all his Cities were taken and possessed. After this, Moses with-drawing himself back again to the Mountains of Abarim, left the prosecution of that war unto Jair the son of Manasse: who conquering the East parts of Basan, to wit, the Kingdom of Argob, even unto the Nations of the Gessuri and Machati, &c. walled Cities, called the same after his own name Havoth Jair: of all which conquests afterward the half Tribe of Manasse possessed the North part as far as Edrei, but the East part that belonged to Sehon the Amorite, with the Mountains of Gilead adjoining, was given to Reuben, and unto Gad.

Of the troubles about the Madianites, and of Moses his death.

After these victories, and while Israel sojourn'd in the valley of Moab, the Madianites and Moabites (over both which Nations it seemeth that Balaac King of the Moabites then commanded in chief) fought, according to the advice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrews to the love of their daughters, and by persuading them to honour and serve their Idols, to divide them both in Love and Religion among themselves: thereby the better both to defend their own interest against them, as also to beat them out of Moab, and the Countries adjoining. The Israelites as they had ever been enclined, so were they now easily persuaded to these evil courses, and thereby drew on themselves the plague of pestilence, whereof there perished 24000. persons: besides which punishment of God, the most of the offenders among the Hebrews, were by his commandment put to the Sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the son of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Casi, a Daughter of one of the chiefs of the Madianites, the Plague ceased, and Gods wrath was appeased. For such was the love and kindness of his all-pow'fulness, respecting the ardent zeal of Phineas in prosecuting of Zimri (who being a chief among the Hebrews, become an Idolater:) as he forgave the rest of Israel, and stayed his hand for his sake.

In this valley it was that Moses caused the people to be numbred the third time: and there remained of able men fit to bear arms 601730. of which, as his last enterprise, he appointed 12000. to be chosen out, to invade the Cities of Midian, who, together with the Moabites, practis'd with Balaam to curse Israel: and after that, sought to allure them (as before remembred) from the worship of the true God, to the Service of Eshteor: and to the rest of their barbarous Idolatry. Over which Companies of 12000. Moses gave the charge to Phineas the son of Eleazar the high Priest: who slew the five Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately been, the vassals of Sehon, as appeareth by Joshua. These five Princes of the Midianites slain by Eleazar, were at this time but the vassals of Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Evi, Rakem, Zur, Hur, and Rera, the Dukes of Sehon, saith Joshua. He slew also the men, male-children, and women: saving such as had not yet used the company of men, but those they saved, and dispers'd them among the children of Israel to serve them.

And Moses having now lived 120. years, making both his own weakness of body known to the people, and his inability to travel: and also that he was forewarned of his end by the Spirit of God, from whom he received a new commandment to ascend the Mountains of Abarim, and thereon to render up his life: He hastned to settle the government in Joshua; whom he persuaded with most lively arguments to prosecute the conquest begun, assuring him of Gods favour and assistance therein. And so having spent these his latter days after the conquest of Ag, and Sehon King of the Amorites, in the repetition and exposition of the Law, (or an iteration of the Law, according to Saint Augustine) using both arguments, prayers, and threats unto the people, which he often repeated unto them; thereby to confirm them in knowledge, love, fear, and service of the all-pow'ful God: He blessed the twelve Tribes, that of Simeon excepted, with several and most comfortable blessings: praising the greatness and goodness of him, unto whom in his prayers he commended them: He also commanded the Priests to lay up the Book of the Law, by the side of the Ark of God, The last that he indited, was that Prophetical Song, beginning: Hearken ye Heavens, and I will speak, and let the Earth hear the words of my mouth: and being called by God from the labours and sorrows of this life, unto that Rest which never afterward hath disquiet, he was buried in the Land of Moab, over against Beith-Peor: but no man knoweth of his Sepulcher to this day; which happened in the year of the World, 3344.

Observations out of the Story of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

Now let us a little, for instruction, look back to the occasions of sundry of the great events, which have been mentioned in this Story of the life of Moses, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promise, and fore-choice of this people) he wrought in all things else by the medium of mens affections, and natural appetites. And so we shall find that the fear which Pharaoh had of the increase of the Hebrews, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next natural cause of the sorrows and loss, which befel himself, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when he fought by cruel and ungodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when he commanded all the male children of the Hebrews to be slain, God (whose providence cannot be resisted, nor his purposes prevented by all the foolish and salvage craft of mortal men) moved compassion in the heart of Pharaohs own daughter, to preserve that child, which afterward became the most wise, and of all men the most gentle and mild, the most excellently learned in all Divine and Humane knowledge, to be the conductor and deliverer of his oppressed brethren, and the overthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his Nation; even then, when he fought by the strength of his men of War, of his Horse, and Chariots, to tread them under, and bury them in the dust. The grief which Moses conceived of the injuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrews in his own presence, moved him to take revenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his own Nation, by threatening him to discover the slaughter of the Egyptian, moved him to fly into Madian: the contention between the Shepherds of that place, and Jeithro's Daughters, made him known to their Father; who not only entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters: and in that Solitary life of keeping of his Father-in-Laws sheep, far from the preas of the World, contenting himself (though bred as a Kings Son) with the Lot of a poor Herd-f-man, God found him out in that Desert wherein he first suffered him to live many years, the better to know the waies and passages through which he purposed that he should conduct his people, toward the Land promised: and therein appearing unto him, he made him know his will and divine pleasure for his return into Egypt. The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterward by Gods direction performed in the Story of Israel before remembred. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seem unto men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence, but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many years after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt; and of the Men of renown in other Nations, about the times of Moses and Joshua; with the sum of the History of Joshua.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to have War, were divers waies, as it were prepared to be their Enemies.

IN like manner, if we look to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to do, either in the Wilderness, or afterward, we shall find them long before-hand, by the disposing providence of God, as it were, prepared for enmity: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham; and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Israelites) were mingled with them by mutual marriages: whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diversity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were, prepared to be enemies to the Israelites: and so to serve for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, we must understand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountains of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same mountains continued as far as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea, on the South: and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the sons of Cham, the other from Sem: but those of

It seemeth also that Huz, the Son of Nachor, and Baz his Brother, planted themselves in the East side of Jordan, about Huz, where they find the Land of Huz, in which Job dwelt as one of the issue of Huz, the Son of Nachor, and Eliah, his friend who is called a Huzite. See hereafter chap. 10. sect. 7.

Sem, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither, in effect, but with one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kinsred. The other for the great- est part, were the Canaanites, the antient Lords and possessors of those Territories, by process of time divided into several Families and Names: whereof some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamzummims, or Zuzi, Emims, Horites, and others. These (as men most valiant and able commonly do) did inhabit the utter borders and Mountains of their Countries: the rest were the Zidonians, Jebusites, Amorites, Hevites, Hittites, and others, who took name after the sons of Canaan, and after whom the Country in general was still called.

As for the Hebrews which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Family, and strangers in that Country, especially the Israelites: and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or induce them, no more than the Philistines did, who descended also of Cham by Mixraim. For though Abraham himself, being a stranger, was highly esteemed and honoured among them; especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Jordan: yet now even they which descended from Abraham, or from his kinsred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites, as holding them strangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity, than of their old pedigree from Abraham.

True it is, that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kinsred, who had linked themselves, and marched with the Canaanites and others, had so far posset themselves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to be equal in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. For of Lot came those two great Families of the Moabites, and Ammonites: of Eshan the Edumians: of Midian the Madianites: of Ismael the eldest son of Abraham, came the Ismaelites, with whom are joyned, as of the same Nation, the Amalekites; whom though the more common opinion thinketh to have been a Tribe of Edom, because Eshan had a grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason convinceth it to have been otherwise.

For the Israelites were forbidden to provoke the Edumites, or do them any wrong; whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and endless war decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere, Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismael's eldest son Naboth sprung the Arabians of Petra, called Nabathei. Now even as Abraham besought God to bless Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and perform it. For of him those twelve Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land between Havilah upon Tygris, and Sur which is the West part of the Desert of Arabia Petraea. Yet howsoever the strength of these later named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great; it is not unlikely, but that some reason which moved them not to favour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of fear: because all Princes and States do not willingly permit any stranger or powerful Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not so united in and among themselves, but that they had their jealousies of each other, and contended for dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood apart or united, they were taught by the care of their own preservation, to joyn themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resolutely as the Canaanites did. For the Edumians onely denied the Hebrews a passage, which the Moabites durst not deny: because their Country lay more open; and because themselves had lately been beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites their Country lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og, Kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong by reason of the mountains which divided it from Basan. Again, that which moved the Moabites in their own reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his confederate, was, that the Moabites might hope, after such a time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recover again their own inheritance: to wit, the Valleys and Plains lying between the mountains of Arabia and Jordan: But as soon as Sehon was slain, and that the King of Moab, Balaam, perceived that Moses allotted that Valley to the Tribes of Gad and Reuben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the daughters of Midian, as aforesaid, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at the length the Moabites, by special occasion, were more and more stirred up to enmity against Israel. And as for divers of the rest that were descended from Abraham's kinsred, we may note, how in the beginning, between the Authors of their Pedigrees, God permitted some enmities to be, as it were, prefaces of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier incensed by the memory of old grudges: and withall, by some disdain from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest son of Abraham, and the Edumites from the eldest son of Isaac, Jacob, being but a second son, of a second brother; those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses, being natural men, might scorn to give place, much less to subject themselves to their inferiours, as they took it: and for a more aggravation, the issues of Eshan, Princes of Edumians, might keep in record, that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Jacob's taking his advantage, and that he was deceived of his Father's blessing also by him: and that Jacob, after reconciliation, came not unto him as he promised, into Seir or Edumia.

So also in the posterity of Ismael, it might remain as a seed or pretence of enmity, that their fore-father was by the indignation of Sara, cast out into the Desert, with his mother Hagar, and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angel to relieve them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his Mother and to his Wife: and Amalec was also an Horite by his Mother: which Horites were of the antient Canaanites. The Edumians also, or Edumites, were by their Maternal line descended of the Canaanites. For Eshan took two wives of that Nation: one of them was Adath, the daughter of Elon, the Hittite, and the other Abolibamah, the grand-child of Zibeon, the Hevite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Eshan, and called after his name, Edom, or Edumia.

Lastly it appeareth that all those Families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edumites, &c. were in process of time corrupted, and drawn from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conversation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wives of the Canaanites which they had married: onely a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Jethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and ever-living God.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the antient Wars of the Israelites.

OF the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Pedigree) we find four named by Moses: and one and thirty remembered by Joshua, though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities over which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territory adjoining, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a general consideration are to be understood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Hevites, &c. and so here we understand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Country of their habitation the holy Land, or the Land of promise: for God hath appointed that the seven principle Families should be rooted out, and that his own people should inherit their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan, on the East, and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: in which narrow Country, and in the choicest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternal name chiefly inhabited.

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemer, of the Hevites, whom Simeon and Levi slew, together with his Son Sichem, in revenge of their sisters' ravishment.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures have remembered, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the dead Sea; the same which surprised Israel, as they encamped in the Wilderness in the edge of Edumia.

The third named was Sehon King of Essebon, who before Moses arrival had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petraea, or Nabathea, and thrust them over Arnon into the Deserts, the same whom Moses overthrew in the plains of Moab: at which time he took Essebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites.

Presently after which victory, Og was also slain by Israel, who commanded the North part of that Valley between the Mountains Tracani, or Galaad, and Jordan, who was also a King of the Amorites.

The fifth was Adonizedek King of the Jebusites, and of Hiernusken, with whom Joshua nameth four other Kings.

Hobam,

Jofua to Jofeph ant. 1. 5. cap. 1. Hobab, King of Hebron. Pirani, King of Jarmuth. Japia, King of Lachis: and Deber, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites overthrown in battle; and hanged by Jofua. After this overthrow Jofua nameth Jabin, King of Hazor, and Jobab, King of Madon: whom he also slaughtered, and took his Cities: and this Jabin seemed to have some dominion over the rest; for it is said in the Text, For Hazor before times was the head of all those Kingdoms.

After these Adonibezek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confess that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands and feet of seventy Kings, informing them to gather crumbs under his Table: who, after Juda and Simeon had used the same execution upon himself, acknowledged it to be a just revenge of God: this King was carried to Hiernjalem where he died.

The last King named is Jabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Jofua. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom he oppressed twenty years after the death of Ehud, he inhabited Hazor. This Jabin, Barac (encouraged by Deborah) overthrew; and his Captain Sisara had by Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, a nail driven into his head while he slept in her Tent: Jabin himself perishing afterward in that war.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites; and they held a corner of Land in Nabathæa: to the South-East of the Dead Sea. They descended from Median Abraham's son, by Cethura. Raguel surnamed Gethogelus or Jethro, faith Jofeph, called Jethro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Judges, the son of Dathan, the grand-child of Jexanis, or Jokhanan, the great grand-child of Abraham by Cethura, was Priest or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea: whose Daughter or Niece, Moses married, and of whom, I have spoken elsewhere more at large. This Jethro, if he were not the same with Hobab, must be his father: and this Hobab had seven daughters. He guided Moses in the Wilderness, and became one of the Israelites: of him descended the Kenites, so called of his father Raguel's surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Jabin the second, even now remembered.

At such time as Saul invaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israel, gave them warning to separate themselves: and yet the Kenites had strong seats, and lived in the mountains of the Deserts.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named, were these:

1. Homer the Hevite of Sichem
2. Arad of the South parts
3. Sehon of Essebin
4. Og of Basán
5. Adonibezek the Jebusite, King of Hiernjalem.
6. Hobab of Hebron
7. Pirani of Jarmuth
8. Japia of Lachis
9. Debir of Eglon
10. Jabin of Hazor
11. Jobab of Madon
12. Adonibezek of Bezek, and 13. Jabin the second King of Hazor.

Of the Madianites these:

* Evi or Evek.

Rekam or Recem, who built Petra the Metropolis of Petrea, so called by the Greeks, and by Esay, cap. 16. v. 1. and Selah, which as much as Petra: and so also it is called Reg. 14. 7. where it is also called Jokibael.

After the death of Barac, Judge of Israel, the four last named of these Madianite Kings vexed Israel seven years: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and slain by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Jordan, as in the 6. 7. and 8. of Judges it is written at large. Afterward in the pursuit of the rest, Gideon himself laid hands upon Zebab and Salmunna, or Zalmunna, and executed them being prisoners; in which expedition of Gideon there perished 20000. of the Madianites and their confederates. Of the Zalmunna, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speak hereafter in the description of their Territories.

§. III.

Of the Amalekites and Ismaelites.

OF the Kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I find few that are named; and though of the Ismaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied unto a greater Nation, according unto the promise of God made unto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Midianites were numbered among them, were more renowned in Moses time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul governed Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sur unto Havilah, to wit, over a great part of Arabia Petrea, and the Desart. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelve Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leave those barren Desarts of Arabia Petrea, called Sur, Paran, and Sin, to the issue of Abraham by Cethura, that joynt with them (for so seem the Amalekites to have been, and so were the Midianites) themselves taking possession of a better Soil in Arabia the Happy, and about the Mountains of Galaad in Arabia Petrea: For Nabathæa the eldest of those twelve Princes planted that part of Arabia Petrea; which was very fruitful, though adjoining to the Desart in which Moses wandered, afterward called Nabathæa: the same which neighbourth Judea on the East-side. They also peopled a Province in Arabia the Happy, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathæi (B) changed into (P.)

Kedar, the second of Ismael's sons, gave his own name to the East-part of Basán, or Batanea, which was afterward posselt by Manasse, so much thereof as lay within the mountains Tracani, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, and Pliny, Cedreanis.

Abbeel sat down in the Desart Arabia, near the Mountains which divide it from the Happy: and gave name to the Adubens, which Ptolomy calleth Agubens.

Isabani was the Parent of the Isabani, near the Mountain Zamath, in the same Arabia the Happy.

The Raubens were of Mishma: who joynted to the Orchems, near the Arabian gulf, where Ptolomy setteth Zagnani.

Of Duma were the Dumneans, between the Adubens and Raubens: where the City Dumeth nameth stood.

Of Masse the Masfati, and of Hadar, or Chadar, the Athritæ, who bordered the Napathens in the same Happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaueans, among the Arabian Mountains, where also the City of Thema is seated.

Of Jetur the Jeturæans, or Camathens: of whom Jetur was King in David's time.

Of Naphtali, the Nabothian Arabians, inhabiting Syria Zoba: over whom Adadecor commanded, while David ruled Israel.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismael's sons, was the Ancestor of the Cadmonæans: who were afterward called Astæ, because they worshipped the Fire with the Babylonians.

The Amalekites gave their Kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians, Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabathæans, Aretas, as names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses after he past the Red Sea: when of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished.

Afterward they joynted with the Canaanites, and beat the Israelites near Cadesbarne. After the government of Othniel, they joynted them with the Moabites: after Barac, with the Madianites, and invaded Israel. God commanded that as soon as Israel had rest, they should root out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul executed in part, when he wasted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Chaldea: from Havilah to Shur.

In David's time they took Siklag in Simeon: but David followed them, and surprised them, recovering his prisoners and spoils. And yet, after David became King, they again vexed him, but to their own loss.

In Ezekias time, as many of them as joynted to Ethiopia, were wasted and dispianted by the children of Simeon.

§. IV.

Of the institution of Civility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

HERE lived at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but even now enriched with the written Law of the living God, so did Art and Civility (bred and fostered far off in the East, and in Egypt) begin at this time to discover a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Judea. For if Pelagius, besides his bodily strength, was choicest King of Arcadia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from rain and storm: and learned them withal to make a kind of Meale, and bread of Acorns, who before lived, for the most part, by Herbs and Roots: we may thereby judge how poor and wretched those times were, and how fallily those Nations have vaunted of their antiquities, accompanied not only with civil Learning, but with all other kinds of knowledge. And it was in this age of the World, as both Enselinus and S. Augustine have observed, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea ferunt de Into formasse homines homines, quia optimus sapientie doctor fuisse perhibetur. Of whom it is reported, that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of wisdom: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the invention of fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inventa sapientie perinere: To have reference to wife inventions: and Æschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Jupiter's fire was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Stars, and other celestial bodies. Again, it is written of him, that he had the art to use this fire, as thereby he gave life to the Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meanings, that before his birth and being, those people among whom he lived, had nothing else worthy of men, but external form and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrails the while devoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire he had to investigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of heavenly bodies; for so it is said: Ideo altissimi ascendit Caucasum, ut sereno celo quam longissimi astra signorum obitus & ortus spectaret; That he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a clear sky discern a far off the settings and risings of the Stars: though Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwife, and others diversly.

Of this mans knowledge Æschylus gives this testimony.

Africanus makes Prometheus far more ancient, and but 94. years after Ogyges. Porphyrus says, that he lived at once with Isaac, who lived with Isaac.

There lived also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sons of Jupiter, of whom though it be said, that they were born before Moses dayes, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the advantage of their long lives gave them a part of other ages among men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these sons of Jupiter, Æschylus finds two other, to wit, Oceanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gave name to the Evening, and so to the Evening Star. Also besides this Atlas of Lybia, or Mauritania, there were others which bare the same name: but of the Lybiens and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountains which cross Africa, to the South of Morocco, Sus, and Hea, with the Sea adjoining, took name, which memory Plato in Critias bestowes on Atlas, the son of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions affirmeth, that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to express divine knowledge. Nec vero Atlas scitine caplum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucas, nec stellatus Cepheus cum uxore traheretur, nisi divina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabule traduxisset; Neither should Atlas be said to bear up heaven, nor Prometheus to be fastened to Caucasus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be stellified, unless their divine knowledge had raised upon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometimes express'd Time by Prometheus, sometime he took him for Saturn; as, Rheæ conjux alma Prometheus. But that the Story of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction, and that he lived about this time, the most approved Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Eusebius and S. Augustine, have not doubted: For the great judgment which Atlas had in Astronomy, saith S. Augustine, were his daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleiades and Hyades. Others attribute unto him the finding out of the Moons course, of which Archus the son of Orchomenus challengeth the invention. Of this Arcaus, Arcaidia in Peloponnesus took name; and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moon: Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to be understood, saith Natalis Comes, before there had been any observation of the Moons course: or of her working in inferior bodies. And though there be that bestow the finding out thereof upon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Iscinus Tzetzes, a curious searcher of antiquities, gave it Atlas of Lybia: who, besides his gifts of mind, was a man of unequalled and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Miletan, as it is said, had the ground of his Philosophy.

of Deucalion and Phaeton.

IN this age of the World, and while Moses yet lived, Deucalion reigned in Thessaly. Crotopus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion was the son of Prometheus, saith Hierodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo: Hesiodus gave him Pandora for mother; the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odyssey, makes Deucalion the son of Minos: but he must needs have meant some other Deucalion; for else either Ulysses was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Ulysses, after his return from Troy, feigned himself to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was son to this later Deucalion, the son of Minos: but this Minos lived but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus served in that war) and this Deucalion the son of Prometheus, who lived at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalion's time happened that great inundation in Thessaly: by which in effect every soul in those parts perished, but Deucalion, Pyrcha his wife, and some few others. It is affirmed, that at the time of this flood, in Thessaly, those people exceeded in all kind of wickedness and villany: and as the impurity of men is the forcible attractive of Gods vengeance, to did all that Nation for their foul sins perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and cruelty of all mankind drew on them that general destruction by the flood universal. Onely Deucalion, and Pyrcha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be lovers of Virtue, of Justice, and of Religion: Of whom Ovid:

Vir fuit: aut illa reverentior ulla deorum.*

No man was Better, nor more just than hee:
Nor any woman godlier than shee.

It is also affirmed, that Prometheus foretold his son Deucalion of this over-flowing, and advised him to provide for his safety: who hereupon prepared himself a kind of Vessel, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calls Cibotium; and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward add the sending out of the Dove, to discover the waters fall and decrease, I should verily think that Story had been but an imitation of Noah's flood devised by the Greeks, did not the time so much differ, and S. Augustine with others of the Fathers and reverent Writers approve this Story of Deucalion: Among other his children, Deucalion had these two of note; Hellen, of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas, and Melanthe, on whom Neptune is said to have begot Delphus, which gave name to Delphos, so renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

And that which was no less strange and marvellous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also happened under Phaeton; not only in Ethiopia, but in Asia, a Region in Italy, and about Cuma, and the Mountains of Resivius: of both which the Greeks, after their manner, have invented many strange fables.

s. VI.

Of Hermes Trifugus.

BUT of all other which this age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous and renowned: the same which was also called Trifugus, or Ter Maximus; and of the Greeks, Hermes.

Many there were of this name; and how to distinguish, and set them in their own times, both S. Augustine and Laetantius find it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the god of Theeves, the God of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and the god of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercury, of whose many works some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certain of the Greeks reckon five Mercuries. Of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the son of Nilus, whose name the Egyptians sent to utter, as the Jews did Tetragrammaton; the other that Mercury, which slew Argus in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is said to have delivered literature to the Egyptians, and to have given them laws. But Diodorus affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Egypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying; That letters were not found out by that Mercury which slew Argus, but by that ancient Mercury, otherwife Thevet; whom Philo Byblinus writeth Tauntus; the Egyptians, Thoyb; the Alexandrines, Thot, and the Greeks, (as before) Hermes. And to this Tauntus, Sanconiathe, who lived about the war of Troy, gives the invention of letters.

ters. But S. Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, calls neither of them the son of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to have slain Argus. For he finds this Mercury the slayer of Argus, to the grand-child of that Atlas, which lived while Moses was yet young. And yet L. Vives upon S. Augustine seems to understand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest have remembered. But that conjecture of theirs, that any Grecian Mercury brought letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any truth in prophane antiquity) that all the knowledge which the Greeks had, was transported out of Egypt or Phenicia, and not out of Greece, nor by any Grecian into Egypt. For they all confess, that Cadmus brought letters first into Beotia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phenicia: it being true, that between Mercurius, that lived at once with Moses and Cadmus, there were these descents cast; Crotopus King of the Argives, with whom Moses lived, and in whose time about his tenth year Moses died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus, who reigned eleven years; after him Danans fifty years; after him Lidæus: in whose time, and after him in the time of Mino King of Crete, this Cadmus arrived in Beotia. And therefore it cannot be true that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Egypt, whom Saint Augustine remembereth, the one the grandfather, the other the Nephew or grand-child, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moses found out letters, and taught the use of them to the Jews: of whom the Phenicians their neighbours received them; and the Greeks of the Phenicians by Cadmus. But this invention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembered; that is, because the Jews and the Phenicians had them first from him. For every Nation gave unto those men the honour of first Inventors, from whom they received the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercury, upon part of whose works he commenteth, to have been four descents after Moses; which he hath out of Virgil, who calls Atlas, that lived with Moses, the maternal grandfather of the first famous Mercury, whom others, as Diodorus, call the Counselor and Instructor of that renowned Isis, wife of Osiris. But Ficinus giveth no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury instructed Isis, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth; and that such an Inscription was found on a pillar erected on the Tomb of Isis. Lod. Viver upon the six and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Book of Saint Augustine, de Civitate Dei, conceiveth, that this Mercury, whose works are extant, was not the first which was entituled Ter Maximus; but his Nephew or Grand-child, * Sanchoniaton, an ancient Phenician, who lived shortly after Moses. Or. de civitate Dei. See Isis de prop. l. 1. c. 6. hath other fancies of this Mercury; affirming that he was the Scriba of Saturnus, and called by the Phenicians, Phanotus, and by the Egyptians, Thoot, or Thoyt. It may be, that the many years which he is said to have lived, to wit, three hundred years, gave occasion to some Writers to find him in one time, and to others in other times. But by those who have collected the grounds of the Egyptian Philosophy and Divinity, he is found more ancient than Moses: because the Inventor of the Egyptian Wisdom, wherein it is said, that Moses was excellently learned.

It is true, that although this Mercury or Hermes doth in his Divinity differ in many particulars from the Scriptures, especially in the approving of Images, which Moses of all things most detested; yet whosoever shall read him with an even judgment, will rather resolve, that these works, which are now extant, were by the Greeks and Egyptian Priests corrupted, and those fooleries inserted, then that ever they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and spirit devised. For there is no man of understanding, and master of his own wits, that hath affirmed in one and the same Tract, those things which are directly contrary in doctrine, and in nature: For out of doubt (Moses excepted) there was never any man of those elder times that hath attributed more, and in a file more reverend and divine unto Almighty God, than he hath done. And therefore if those his two Treatises now among us; the one converted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had been found in all things like themselves: I think it had not been perillous to have thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moses himself; and that the Egyptian Theologie hereafter written, was devised by the first, and more ancient Mercury, which others have thought to have been Joseph, the son of Jacob: whom, after the exposition of Pharaoh's dreams, they called Sapienterphane, which is as much to say, as Abcanditorum reperator. A finder out of hidden things. But these are overventurous opinions. For what this man was, it is known to God. Envy and aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worn out the certain knowledge of him: of whom, whosoever he were, Lactantius writeth eth in this sort: *Hic scripsit libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem divinorum rerum pertinentes, in quibus Majestatem summi ac singularis Dei asserit, iisdemque nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deus & Patrem; He hath written many Books belonging to, or expressing the knowledge of divine things, in which he affirmeth the Majesty of the most High, and one God, calling him by the same names of God and Father, which we do. The same Father also teacheth not to number him among the Sybils and Prophets. And so contrary are these his acknowledgments to those Idolatrous fictions of the Egyptians and Grecians: as for my self I am persuaded, that whatsoever is found in him contrary thereto was by corruption inserted. For thus much himself confesseth: *Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim ex eius esse prodeunt, perfectissimum existens, & generator, & opifex, &c. God (saith he) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountain and life, and power, and light, and mind, and spirit: and all things are in him, and under him. For his Word out of himself proceeding, most perfect, and generative, and operative; springing upon fruitful nature; made it also fruitful and producing. And he was therefore (saith Sydus) called Ter Maximus; quia de Trinitate loquens est, in Trinitate unum esse Deum asserens; Because he spake of the Trinity, affirming that there is one God in Trinitie: *Hic ruinam (saith Ficinus) prævidit præsente Religione, hic ortum novæ fidei, hic adventum Christi, hic futurum iudicium, resurrectionem sæculi, beatorum gloriam, supplicia peccatorum. This Mercury foretold the ruin of the old or superstitious Religion; and the birth of the new faith; and of the coming of Christ, the future judgment, the resurrection; the glory of the blessed, and the torment or affliction of the wicked or damned.

To this I will only add his two last speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Volterran out of Sydus. Hæcenus, fili, passus à patria, vixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolomis repeto. Cumque post paulum à vobis corporis vinculis absolutus discessero, videte ne me quasi mortuum ingeat: nam ad illam optamam beatamque Civitatem regredior, ad quam universi cives mortis conditione venturi sunt. Mihi namque solus Deus est summus Princeps; qui cives suos replet suavitatis iustitia: Ad quam hæcquam multi vitam exstingunt, mors est potius dicenda quam vita; Hæc ubi, O son, being driven from my country, I have lived a stranger and banished man: but now I am repaid homeward again in safety. And when I shall after a few days (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and blood, depart from you, see that you do not bewail me as a man dead; for I do but return to that best and blessed City, to which all her Citizens (by the condition of death) shall repair. Therein is the only God, the most high and chief Prince, who filleth with sweetness his citizens with sweeter more than marvellous: in regard whereof, this being, which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death than a life. The other, and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus converted by others, agreeing in sense, but not in words: with Sydus: O cælum, magni Dei sapiens opus, teque O vox Patris quam ille primam emisit, quando universum constituit mundum, adjuvo per unigenitum ejus Verbum, & Spiritum, cuncta comprehendentem, Misericordiam mei: I adjure thee O heaven, thou wise work of the great God, and thee O voice of the Father, which he first uttered, when he framed the whole World by his only begotten Word, and Spirit, comprehending all things, Have mercy upon me.

But Sydus hath his invocation in these words: Obtestor te cælum, magni Dei sapiens opus, obtestor te vocem Patris, quam loquutus est primum cum omnem mundum firmavit, obtestor te per unigenitum Sermonem omnia continentem, propitius esto; I beseech thee O heaven, wise work of the great God, I beseech thee O voice of the Father, which he spake first when he established all the world; I beseech thee by the only begotten Word, containing all things, be favourable, be favourable.

§. VII.

Of Jannes and Jambres, and some other that lived about those times.

There were also in this age both Aegyptians, which after his death became the god of the Physicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as Vives thinks in his Commentary upon Augustine, de Civitate Dei, lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, Jannes and Jambres, who in that impious art excelled all that ever had been heard of to this day; and yet Moses himself doth not charge them with any familiarity with Devils, or ill Spirits: words indeed that seldom came out of his mouth: however by the Septuagint they are called sophiste, or Venefici, and Incantatores; Sophists, Poyfioners, and Incantators; by Thierome, Sapientes, & malefici; Wise men, and evil doers: and so by Patablus, who also useth the word Atagi. The Greek it self seems to attribute lame-

what of what they did to natural Magick: calling them Magicians, workers by drugs. The Genecan, Sorcerers and Incanters: Junius, Sapientes, Prophetae, Magi, Magicians and Wise men here by him are taken in one fence: and Prophetae are such as dazel mens eyes, and make them seem to see what they see not: as false colours, and false shapes. But as some virtues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded; and the one taken for the other (Religion and Superstition having one face and countenance) so did the works and working of Moses, and of Pharoas Sorcerers appear in outward shew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to be one and the same art and gift of knowledge. For the Devil changeth himself into an Angel of light: and imitateth in all he can the waies and workings of the most High. And yet, on the contrary, every work which surmounteth the wisdom of most men, is not to be condemned, as performed by the help or ministry of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath given to natural things, are such, as where he also bestoweth the knowledge to understand their hidden and best virtues, many things by them are brought to pass, which seem altogether impossible, and above nature or art: which two speculations of works of nature, and of miracle, the Cabalists distinguished by these names; Opus de Beneficis, & opus de mercana: the one they call, Sapientiam naturae; The Wisdom of nature: the other, Sapientiam divinitatis; The Wisdom of divinity: the one Jacob practised in breeding the pious Lambs in Mesopotamia; the other Moses exercised in his miracles wrought in Egypt, having received from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection, to wit, the knowledge of nature: of the other so far as it pleased God to proportion him, both which he used to his glory that gave them: assuming to himself nothing at all, either in the least or most. Also Augustine noteth, that from the time that Moses left Egypt, to the death of Jesus, divers other famous men lived in the World, who, after their deaths, for their eminent virtues, and inventions, were numbered among the gods: as Dionysius, otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Grecians the use of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted Musical plays to Apollo Delphicus: thereby to regain his favour, who brought barrenness and scarcity upon that part of Greece, because they resisted not the attempts of Danaus, who spoiled his Temple, and set it on fire: so did Eriothoni- us institute the like games to Minerva: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oyl, in memory of her that first prest it out of the Olive.

In this age also Xanthus ravished Europa, and began on her Kadamanthus, Sarpedom and Minos, which three are also given to Jupiter by other Historians. To these Saint Augustine addeth Hercules; the same to whom the twelve labours are ascribed, native of Tyrinthia a City of Peloponnesus: (or as others say, only nursed and brought up there) who came into Italy, and destroyed many Monsters there; being neither that Hercules, which Enchirius furnameth Delphin, famous in Phenicia; nor that Hercules, according to Philophrastus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Egyptian: Alanus Philophrastus fit, non Thebanum Herculem, sed Egyptium ad Gades pervenisse, & ibi suum statuisse terra (saith Philophrastus;) It is manifest, that it was the Egyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which travelled as far as the straits of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. In this time also while Moses wandered in the Deserts, Dardanus built Dardania.

But whosoever they were, or how worthy soever they were that lived in the Days and Age of Moses, there was never any man, that was no more than Man, by whom it pleased God to work greater things; whom he favoured more, to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) he so often appeared; never any man more familiar and conversant with Angels; never any more learned both in Divine and Humane knowledge; never a greater Prophet in Israel. He was the first that received and delivered the Law of God entire; the first that left to posterity by letters, the truth and power of one infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World Universal, and all the creatures therein; that taught the detestation of Idolatry, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed.

Syracides calleth Moses the beloved of God and men, whose remembrance is blessed. He made him (saith the same Author) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the fear of his enemies, made him glorious in the sight of Kings, shewed him his glory, caused him to hear his voice, sanctified him with faithfulness and meekness, and chose him out of all men.

He is remembered among prophane Authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetic: by Megasthenes, and Nimeneus the Pythagorians. The long lives which the Patriarchs enjoyed ed before the flood, remembered by Moses, Ephraim, Hieronymus, Aegyptius, Hecatanus, Elamius, Aesflant, Ephorus, and Alexander the Historian, confirm. The universal flood which God revealed unto Moses, Berosus, Nicolas Damascenus, and others, have testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Abydenus, Ephorus, and Sy-billa have approved. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Hecatanus wrote a book of him. Damascenus before cited, speaketh of Abraham's passage from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the books of Moses. Enpolemon writeth the very same of Abraham, which Moses did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the overthrow thereof by divine power, he saith that Abraham, born in the tenth generation, in the City called Cannan, or Urie, excelled all men in wisdom: and by whom the Astrology of the Caldeans was invented. It is Justinus priest que sua (saith Enchirius out of the same Author) se Deo gratus fuit, ut divino praecepto in Phoenicia veneris, ibique habitaveris; For his justice and piety he was so pleasing unto God, as by his commandment he came into Phenicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Dionysius Siculus in his second Book and fifth Chapter, speaketh reverently of Moses. There are many other among prophane Authors, which do confirm the books of Moses, as Enchirius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospel, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I refer the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these words: Moses enim affirmavit, docuisseque Aegyptios non recte sentire, quid beneficii & pecorum imagines distribuerunt: itemque Aegyptios & Greecos, qui diis hominum figuram assignaverunt: id vero solum esse Deum, quod nos, & terrarum & mare continet, quod cultum, & mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cuius profecto imaginem, non solum mentis, alicujus earum rerum, quod pens non sunt, similem audeat effingere. Proinde omnis simulacrorum effigione repudiata dignum est Templum ac Delubrum constitutum: ac sine aliqua figura colendum: Moses affirmavit et docuit, has ite Aegyptios habuisse animas, quibus attribuitur unto God the images of beasts and cattle: Also that the Africans and Greeks greatly erred in giving unto their gods the shapes of men: whereas that truly is God indeed, which containeth both us, the earth and sea, which we call heaven, the world, and the nature of all things, whose image, doubtless, no wise man will dare to fashion out unto the likeness of those things, which are amongst us. That therefore (all devising of Idols cast a- side) a worthy Temple and place of prayer was to be erected unto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

Now concerning the Egyptian wisdom, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in his works and words; the same is corrected (how truly I know not) by Diogenes, Diogenes, Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Judaeus, and Enchirius Cesarisensis, and divided into four parts, viz. Mathematical, Natural, Divine, and Moral.

In the Mathematical part, which is distinguished into Geometry, Astronomy, Arithmetic, and Musick, the ancient Egyptians excelled all others. For Geometry which is by interpretation, Measuring of grounds, was useful unto them: because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yearly overflowed and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged unto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomy, the site of the Country being a level and spacious Plain, free and clear from the clouds, yielded them delight with ease, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Stars.

Arithmetic also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied; because without it, in Geometry and Astronomy, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musick they made no other account, nor desired farther knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serve and magnifie their gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Natural part of this Wisdom, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of natural things, differs little from Peripatetic Philosophy; teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies, and living creatures have their being; that Heaven is round like a Globe; that all Stars have a certain sovent heat, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that rains proceed and be from mutations in the air; that the Planets have their proper flocks, &c.

The Divine part of this wisdom, which is called Theology, teacheth and believeth that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first original in Egypt; partly by means of the temperance of that Country, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heat, are offensive: and partly through the fertility, that Nilus giveth in those places: That the soul is immortal, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all gods, and that from this God, other gods are, as the Sun and Moon, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and divers Images, because the true similitudes of the gods is not known; that many of the gods have been in the estate of mortal men, and after death, for their virtues and benefits bestowed on mankind, have been Deified; that those beasts, whose Images and Forms the Kings did carry in their Arms, when they obtained victory, were adored for gods: because under those Emblems they prevailed over their enemies. Moreover the Egyptian Divines had a peculiar kind of writing, mystical, and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obfuscated.

Clem. Stron
4. 5. Clement distributeth the whole sum of this later Egyptian learning into three several sorts, viz. Epistolary, which is used in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred, which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which is expressed by letters Alphabetical in obscure and figurative words; as for example, where it is written: The Ibis by the Hornet participateth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: The Moon doth by the Sun borrow part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of Divine beauty; the other symbolical, or by signatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitative, Tropical, and Enigmatical: Imitative, which delineeth things by characters, like to the things signified, as by a Circle the Sun; and by the Horns of the Moon; the Moon itself: Tropical or transcendent, which applies the divers forms and figures of natural bodies or creatures, to signify the dignities, fortunes, conditions, virtues, vices, affections, and actions of their gods, and of men. So with the Egyptian Divines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Hornet signifieth the Sun, the picture of the Bird this signifieth the Moon: by the form of a Man, Prudence, and Skillfulness: by a Lion, Fortitude: by a Horse, Liberty: by a Crocodile, Impudency: by a Fish, Hatred is to be understood: Enigmatical is a composition, or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which fence, the monstrous Image of a Lions body having a Mans head, was graven on their Temples and Altars, to signify, that to men all divine things are Enigmatical and obscure. So the Image of the Sun set on the head of a Crocodile, (which liveth as well in the Waters, as on Land) expresseth; that the Sun nourisheth Meteors in the Air, as well from the Waters, as from the Earth: So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Ear, signifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and governing all things. The Scythians are thought to have been delighted with this kind of writing. For Pherecydes Syrius reporteth, That when Darius sending letters, threatened Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruine and destruction of his Kingdom, unless he would acknowledge subjection: Idanthura returned to him a Mouse, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Ploughshare: which Orotopagus, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to signify, that by the Mouse, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their air: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their Lands were signified to be ready to be delivered to Darius, as their Sovereign Lord. But Xenophanes made another construction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his men did haunt away, as a Bird through the aire, or creep into holes as a Mouse, or run into the waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape his arms, but either be slain, or being made Captives, till his grounds. The same History is with little difference reported by Herodotus, viz. that the fourth and last part, which is Moral and Politick, doth contain especially the Laws, which (according to Laertius) Alexandrus Trimegistus, or Tertullianus devised: who in his Books or Dialogues of Pythagoras, and Aristotle, hath written to many things of God, worthy of admiration; as well as Sixtus Senensis of the Trinity, and of the coming of Christ, as of the last and fearful day of Judgment: that (as faith the same Author, the opinion being also ancient) he is not only to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Tamblicus in his Books of Mysteries of the Egyptians, taking two very antique Historians for their Authors, to wit, Selenus and Menetus, affirmeth, that this Mercurius was not only the Inventor of the Egyptian Philosophy, but of all other learning, called the Wisdom of the Egyptians, before remembered: and that he wrote of that subject 36525 Books or Pages. Of which there were numbered, of Fiery Spirits, one hundred Books; of Aereal Spirits as many; and of Spirits Celestial a thousand; which because they were out of the Egyptians language converted by certain learned Philosophers into natural Greek, they seemed to have been first written in that Tongue. Clement Alexandrinus writeth, 16.

writeth, that among the Books of Hermes, to wit, of the Wisdom of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36. Of Physick, six Books; of the orders of Priests, ten; and of Astrology, four.

§. VIII.

A Brief of the History of Josua; and of the space between him and Othniel: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Contemporaries to Josua: and of the breach of Faith.

AFTER the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth year of the Egression, in the first month called Nisan, or March, Josua, the son of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wisdom, took on him the government of Israel: God giving him comfort, and encouraging him to pass the River of Jordan, and to possess and divide among the Israelites, the land promised.

The beginning of Josua's rule, Saint Augustine dates with the reign of Amyntas, the eighteenth King in Affrica; with Corax the sixteenth King in Sicyonia, when Darius governed the Argives; and Erithonius, Athenis.

Josua imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent over Jordan certain discoverers to view the seat and strength of Jerico, the next City unto him on the other side of the River, which he was to pass over. Which discoverers being saved, and sent back by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, because she kept a Tavern or Victualling-house, made Josua know, that the inhabitants of Jerico, and those of the Country about it, hearing of the approach of Israel, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the return of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth year after the Egression, Josua removed from Sittim in the plains of Moab, and drew down his Army to the banks of the River Jordan; and gave them commandment to put themselves in order to follow the Ark of God, when the Levites took it up, and moved towards the River, giving them withal this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselves of his favour and presence, who is Lord of all the world, when the River of Jordan should be cut off and divided, and the waters coming from above should stand still in a heap, whereby those below towards the Dead Sea wanting supply, they might pass over into the Land of Canaan with dry feet.

He also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themselves (according to their Covenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and as we call it in this age, to lead in the Vanguard, which through all the Deserts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Juda had performed. For these Tribes being already provided of their habitations, and Country, and Cities of the Amorites by the help of the rest, conquered for them: it agreed with justice and equality, that Reuben, Gad, and the half of Manasse should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession.

On the banks of Jordan they rested themselves from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first month Nisan, or March, they pass'd over to the other side, taking with them twelve stones from the dry ground in the midst of the River: which, for a memory of that miracle by God wrought, they set up at Gilgal, on the East-side of the city of Jerico, where they encamped the first night. At which place Josua gave commandment, that all born in the last fortieth year in the Deserts should be circumcised, which ceremony to that day had been omitted. Of the neglect whereof S. Augustine giveth for cause, The peoples contempt of their Superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this sort, That the Israelites knew not the certain time of their removing from one place to another: Damascus, That it was not needfull by circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such times as they lived by themselves, and a-part from all Nations.

On the fourteenth day of the same month, the children of Israel celebrated the Passover now the third time; first, at their leaving Egypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; and now at Gilgal. After which, being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Country, and having, as it were, surfeited on Manna, they parched of the Corn of the Land, being not yet full ripe, and eat thereof.

And as Moses began to distribute those Regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Sehon held, so did Josua perform the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, he gave to each Tribe his portion by lot. But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three several times; first, by Moses to Gad, Reuben, and the half Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands over Jordan; secondly, by Josua, to the Tribe of Juda, Ephraim, and the other half Tribe of Manasse, about the fifth year of his government; proved in the 14. of Josua. v. 10. and a third division was made to the other seven Tribes at Shilo, where Josua seated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

The

The victories of Josua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set down in his own books, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose Story I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the war, those little kings, or reguli of the Canaanites, had not so much understanding, as to unite themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custom of those estates, from whose Governours God hath taken away all wisdom and foresight, they left those of their own Nation, which were next the invaders, to themselves, and to their own defenses; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat far off, might again have been quenched, ere it could spread it self so far as their own Territories and Cities. But after such time as Jerico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed; five of those 31 Kings (all which at length perished in that war) joyned themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendered themselves to Josua. Onely five (the rest looking on to the success) namely, the King of the Jebusites, in Jebus, or Hierusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Jarmoth, Lachis, and Eglon, addrest themselves for resistance: whose Army being by Josua surprized and broken, themselves despairing to escape by flight, and hopeless of mercy by submission, creeping into a Cave under ground, were thence by Josua drawn forth and hanged. In the prosecution of which victory he also took Makkedah, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the relief whereof Horam King of Gezar hastened, and perished. After which Josua possessed himself of Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, destroying the Cities with their Princes.

In the end, and when the South Countries were possit, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made dust: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the over-late counsels of necessity, united themselves, to make one gross strength and body of an Army: which Jabin, King of Hazor, practised and gathered together, by Josua discovered, as the same rested near the Lake of Merom, he used such diligence, as he came on them unawares, and obtaining absolute victory over them, he prosecuted the same to the utmost effect. And, besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities, of which he burnt Hazor onely, reserving the rest for Israel to inhabit and enjoy.

Secondly, Inote, that Josua shewed himself a skilful man of War, for that in those antient times he used the stratagem of an ambush in taking of Ai; and in that he broke the Armies of the first five Kings of the Amo- rites, which attempted Gibeon by surprise. For he marched all night from his Camp at Jah-gal, and set on them early the next day; when he overthrew Jabin and his confederates. After which, making the best profit of his victory, he assaulted the great City of Hazor.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this war, were exceeding admirable as the stay of the River Jordan at the Springs, so as the Army of Israel past it with a dry foot; the fall of Jerico by the sound of the Horns; the showers of Hale-stones, which fell upon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them perished than by the sword of Israel: again, the arrest of the Sun in the firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lightened, as the Israelites had time to execute all those which fled after the overthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a work only proper to the all-powerful God.

Fourthly, out of the passage between Josua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is so plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all evasion, it admitteth no intrusion, nor leaveth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiousness, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called Equivocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a people of the Hevites, expressly and by name, by the commandment of God to be rooted out, and notwithstanding that they were liars, and deceivers, and counterfeits, and that they did over-reach, and as it were, deride Josua, and the Princes of Israel, by feigning to be sent as Embassadors from a far Country, in which travel their cloths were worn, their bread mouldie, which they avowed to have been warm for newness when they first let out; their barrels and bottles of wine broken; their shoes patch'd; and their sacks rent and ragged: Yet Josua having sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel, he durst not, though urged by the multitude of the people, to lay violent hands on them; but he spared both their lives, and the Cities of their inheritance.

Now if ever man had warrant to break faith, and to retract his promise made, Josua had it. For first, the commandment which he received from God to root out this Nation among the rest, preceded by far the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, he might justly have put them men to the sword, and have sack'd their Cities, if there be any evasion from a promise made, whereof the living God is called to witness. For it was not to the Gibeonites he gave peace, because he knew them to be a people hated of God. He told them, that if they were of the Hevites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a strange people that he gave faith, and to a Nation which came from far, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had done in Egypt and over Jordan, sought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the accord, which Israel made with these crafty Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place, That the Israelites accepted their tale, that is, believed what they had said, and confessed not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these men who were known Idolaters, and served those Puppets of the Heathen, men of an apostate Religion, as all Worshippers of Images are, could not challenge the witness of the true God, in whom they believed not. I say therefore, that if ever man might have served himself by any evasion or distinction, Josua might justly have done it. For he need not in this case the help of Equivocation or Mental Reservation. For what he swore, he swore in good Faith; but he swore nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithless subtilty of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises he made in the Name of God, were made to the living God, and not to the dying man, he held them firm and inviolable, notwithstanding that they, to whom he had sworn it, were worshippers of the Devil.

For it is not, as faithless men take it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the Name of the living Lord, and in his presence, That this promise (if it be broken) is broken to a Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a Prince; but the Promise in the Name of God made, is broken to God. It is God that we therein neglect: we therein profess that we fear him not, and that we set him at naught, and despise him. If he that without reservation of Honour, giveth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth, in point of Honour, give the lie to the King himself, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he break Faith with God, that giveth Faith in the presence of God, prometh in his Name, and makes him a witness of the Covenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearful thing for a Son to break the Promise, Will, or Decree of the Father; for a State, or Kingdom, to break those Contracts which have been made in former times, and confirmed by publick faith. For though it were 400 years after Josua, that Saul, even out of devotion, slaughtered some of those people descended of the Gibeonites: yet God, who forgot not what the Predecessors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworn in his Name, afflicted the whole Nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seven of Saul's sons were delivered to the Gibeonites grieved, and by them hanged up.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the help of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equivocation, to swear one thing by the Name of the living God, and to reserve in silence a contrary intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subjects to Kings, of Servants to their Masters, of Vassals to their Lords, of Wives to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trials of right, will not onely be made uncertain, but all the chains whereby free-men are tied in the world, be torn asunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot pals) that we enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by oath that wars take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it, or ought it to be, that makes an oath thus powerful, but this; That he that sweareth by the Name of God, doth assure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true, whom he calleth for a Witness, and in whose presence he that taketh the oath hath promised? I am not ignorant of their poor evasions, which play with the severity of Gods Commandments in this kind: But this indeed is the best answer, That he breaks no faith, that hath none to break. For whoever hath faith and the fear of God, dares not do it.

The Christians in the Holy Land, when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not onely loose it again, but were soon after beaten out of the Holy Land it self: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reverend Bishop which wrote that Story) that Almerick the fiftiech King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadach, and his Vicegerent. The Soldan sanar, who being suddenly invaded by Almerick, drew in the Turk Syracon to their aid: whose Nephew Saladine, after he had made Egypt his own, beat the Christians out of the Holy Land; neither would the wooden Crosse (the very Cross, say they, that Christ died on) give them victory over Saladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge, seeing they had forsworn themselves in his Name that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the Holy Ghost, That he that speaketh lies, shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which uttereth him, slayeth the soul: how much more perilous is it (if any peril be greater than to destroy the soul) to swear a lie? It was Engenius the Pope, that persuaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungary after his great victory over Amurat the Turk, and when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most advantageous that ever was made for the Christians, to break his Faith, and to provoke the Turk to renew the war. And though the said King was far stronger in the field than ever; yet he lost the battel with 30000 Christians, and his own life. But I will stay my hand: For this first volume will not hold the repetition of Gods judgments upon faith-breakers; be it against Infidels, Turks, or Christians of divers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of oaths now-a-days, is rather made a matter of custom, than of conscience.

It is also very remarkable, That it pleased God to leave so many Cities of the Canaanites unconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatry, and as it is said in the Scriptures, To be thorns in their eyes to prove them, and to reach them to make War. For these Cities hereafter named did not onely remain in the Canaanites possession all the time of Joshua; but soon after his death the children of Dan were beaten out of the plain Countries, and enforced to inhabit the Mountains, and places of hardest access. And those of Juda were not able to be masters of their own Vallies; because as it is written in the Judges; The Canaanites had Chariots of Iron. And those principal Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adjoining unto Juda, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistines: as Ascalon, Gath, Ajdod, out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembered in Samuel.

Neither did the children of Manasse ever Jordan expel the Gassurites, nor the Achaabites; which inhabited the North parts of Basan, afterward Traconitis.

Nor the Nephthalims possess themselves of Bethshean, nor of Bethanab; but they enforced those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Asher expel the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Acon, Athlab, Archab, Heblab, Apbke, & Keheh, nor enforced them to tribute.

No more could Zabulon enjoy Kiron, and Nabaloth, nor received tribute from them. Also the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among the Ephraims; and among the children of Manasse, on the West of Jordan, the Canaanites held Bethshean, Taanab, Dor, Ibleam, and Megaddo; yea Hierusalem it self did the Je- bushites defend above four hundred years, even till David's time.

Now Joshua lived one hundred and ten years, eighteen of which he governed Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expressed in the Scriptures, which causeth divers to conjecture diversly of the continuance. Josephus gives him five and twenty years: Seder Ollam Rabbi the Authors of the Hebrew Chronologie eight and twenty; and Massius six and twenty: Maimonius cited by Massius, fourteen: Joannes Lucidus, seventeen: Cajetanus, ten: Eusebius giveth him seven and twenty: and so doth S. Augustine: Adelambon, two and thirty: Codoman, five and twenty. But whereas there passed 480. years from the delivery of Israel out of Egypt, unto the building of the Temple, it is necessary that we allow to Joshua onely eighteen of them; as finding the rest supplied other-wise, which to me seems the most likely, and, as I think, a well approved opinion.

The same necessity of retaining precisely 480. years from the departure out of Egypt unto the building of the Temple, convinceth of error, such as have inserted years between Joshua and Othniel, of whom Eusebius finds eight years, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which he giveth his reason in his four and twentieth and last Chapters upon Joshua: Bunting reckoned it nine years: Bucolzer and Resner but one; Codoman, twenty; and Nicephorus no less than three and thirty: whereas following the sure direction of these 480. years, there can be no void: years found between Joshua and Othniel, unless they be taken out of those eighteen ascribed unto Joshua by the account already specified. The praises and acts of Joshua are briefly written in the six and fortieth Chapter of Ecclusiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him, Who was there before him like to him, for he fought the battels of the Lord.

That he wrote the book called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter, verse 26. And Joshua wrote these words, in the book of the Law of God, which seemeth rather to have been meant by the covenant which Joshua made with Israel in Sichem, where they all promised to serve and obey the Lord: which promise Joshua caused to be written in the book of the Law: and of this opinion were Cajetan and Abulensis: Theodorus doth likewise conceive, that the book of Joshua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intitled Liber Jusferam, remembered by Joshua himself; and others, that it was the work of

10. of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion upon these words of the 26. verse, And Joshua wrote these words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to prove it: for when the people had answered Joshua; The Lord our God will we serve, and his voice will we obey, it followeth that Joshua made a covenant with the people, and wrote the same in the book of the Law of God.

There lived at once with Joshua, Eriibonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beasts together, thereby to till the ground with more ease and speed: And about the same time the fifty Daughters of Danans (as it is said) slew the fifty sons of Egyptus, all but Lyncus, who succeeded Danans, if the tale be true. There lived also with Joshua, Phenix, and Cadmus, and neer the end of Joshua's life, Jupiter is said to have ravished Europa the daughter of Phenix (afterward married to Asterius King of Creta) and begat on her Minos, Radamanthus, and Sarpedon. But S. Augustine reports this ravishment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sons of Jupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was father to Dencalion, and Dencalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the war of Troy, and Sarpedon was in person a young or strong man at the same Trojan war. And so doth Nestor reckon up in the Council of the Greeks, Theseus and Perithous for men of Antiquity and of Ages past: Minos being yet more ancient than any of these. But hereof elsewhere.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Tribes of Israel that were planted in the borders of Phoenicia, with sundry Stories depending upon those places.

S. I.

The Proöme to the description of the whole Land of Canaan; with an Exposition of the name of Syria.

THE Story of the Judges ought to follow that of Joshua, after whom the Common-wealth of the Jews was governed by Kings, of which so many of them as ruled the ten Tribes, shall be remembered when we come to the description of Samaria: but because the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greatest part of the Story past, with that which followeth, hath been acted, I think it very pertinent (for the better understanding of both) to make a Geographical description of those Regions: that all things therein performed by the places known, may the better be understood, and conceived. To which purpose (besides the addition of the neighbour Countries) I have bestowed on every Tribe his proper portion: and do shew what Cities and Places of strength were by the Jews obtained: and what numbers it pleased God to leave unconquered; by whom he might correct and scourge them, when ungrateful for his many graces, they at sundry times forgot or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored those deaf and dead Idols of the Heathen. Divina bonitas (saith Angustine) ideo maxime irascitur in hoc seculo, ne irascatur in futuro: & misericorditer temporalem adhibet severitatem, ne æternam justè inferat ultionem: The divine goodness is especially therefore angry in this world, that it may not be angry in the world to come, and doth mercifully use temporal severity, that it may not justly bring upon us eternal vengeance.

To the Cities herein described, I have added a short Story of the beginnings and ends of divers Kingdoms and Common-wealths: and to help my self herein, I have perused divers of the best Authors upon this subject: among whom, because I find so great disagreement in many particulars, I have rather in such cases adventured to follow mine own reason, than to borrow any one of their old patterns.

And because Canaan, with Palestina of the Philistines, and the Lands of Og and Schon Kings of Basan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but small Provinces of Syria: it shall be necessary, first to divide and bound the general, and so to descend to this particular, now called the Holy Land.

Proh. 18c. tob. 4. Vul. 5. Syria, now Soria, according to the largest description, and as it was antiently taken, embraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea, to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which look into Pontus, called Leucosyrians, or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, and from the coast of Cilicia, which is the North border, unto Idumæa, towards the South, Tigris towards the Sun-rising, and the Mediterranean Sea Westward: it then containeth besides Babylonia, Chaldaea, Arabia the Desert, and Arabia Petrea, that Region also which the Greeks call Mesopotamia, the Hebrews Syria, of the two Rivers, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for so Aran Naharajim is expounded: also Padan Aram; that is, Jugum Syria, because the two Rivers go along in it as it were in a yoke.

Anagellus Edeffa, sometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many small Provinces, as Cælo Syria, which the Latins call Syria Cava, because it lay in that fruitful Valley between the Mountains of Libanus, and Antilibanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others, were seated. Then Damascena, or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the City Damascus, and the Mountains of Libanus, the Royal seat of the Adades, the first Kings of Syria. Adjoyning to it was the Province of Sophene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zoba: over which Adadæzer commanded in Solomon's time. Then Phœnicia, and the people Syraphœnicians: and lastly, Syria Palestina bordering Egypt: of which Ptolomy maketh Judea also a part: and to that Province which Moses calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giveth the name of Syrea Judea.

§. II.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan, and of the promises touching this Land.

Strab. l. 16. c. 62. But that Land which was antiently Canaan, taken a part of Phœnicia, and stretcheth from behind Libanus to the great Deserts between Idumæa and Egypt: bound by the Mid-land Sea on the West, and the Mountains of Hermion, Galaad, and Arnon towards the East: the same Hills which Syria calleth Traconi, or Tracônitis, and Ptolemy, Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the Son of Cham: Et lingua appellata fuit Canaan; The language was also called Canaan, saith Montanus: and after Hebræa of the Hebrews: who took name from Heber, the Son of Sale, according to Saint Augustine. But Arias Montanus not so well allowing of this derivation, makes it a common name to all those of Noah's Sons, who pass over Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, saith he, is as much as transiens, or transmittens of going, or passing over. And because the children of Abraham had for a long time no certain abiding: therefore, as he thinks, they were by the Egyptians called Hebræi, as it were passengers, which is also the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Eusebius long before them both. It had also the name of Judea from Juda; and then afterwards intitled the Holy Land, because therein our Saviour Christ was Born, and Buried. Now this part of Syria was again divided into four; namely, into Edom, (otherwise Seir, or Edumæa) Gahile, Samaria, and Judea. Galilee is double, the superior called Genitium, and the inferior: and that Galilee and Judea are distinguished, it is plain in the Evangelists, though both of them belong to Phœnicia.

Now besides these Provinces of Phœnicia, and Palestina (both which the River of Jordan boundeth; saving that Phœnicia stretcheth a little more Easterly towards Damascus) that part also of the East of Jordan, and within the Mountains of Hermion, Gilead, and Arnon, otherwise Traconi, fell to the possession of half Manasse, Gad, and Ruben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan also: as well because antiently possessed by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enjoyed by the Israelites; which Eastermost parts are again divided into Easan, or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Machabîs, Gessuri, Argobe, Hus. They are known to the later Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in general: and by the names of Tracônitis, Pieria Batanea, &c. of which I will speak in their proper places.

But where Moses describeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the later Provinces, which fell to Manasse, Gad, and Ruben, for these be his words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comest to Gerar until Azuah (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Countrey North and South: then it followeth in the Text; And as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorah, and Admah, and Seboim, even unto Lasfa: by which words Moses fetcheth down the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean. But in Deuteronomy it seemeth to be far more large: For it is therein written; All the places wherein the seal of your feet shall tread, shall be yours: your coast shall be from the Wilder- nefs, and from Libanon, and from the River Perah, unto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrey North and South, this description agreeth with the former: only Libanon is put for Zidon; and the Wilderness for Gerar and Azza, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perah be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth itself both over Arabia Petrea, and the Desert, as far as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites never possessed; nor at any time did so much as invade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceive, that by the River Perah was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Joshua: Behold, I have divided unto you by lot these Nations, that remain to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan with all the Nations that I have destroyed, even unto the great Sea Westward.

And though it be true, that David greatly enlarged the Territory of the Holy Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it put per gentes amicitiam receptas. For David did not at any time enter so far to the East as Assyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countreys give advantage to those that would make any irreligious cavill, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites unperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and service, it pleased him not only to inclose them within that Territory, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elsewhere to subject them unto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish gods themselves also served and obeyed. And sure the promise by which the Hebrews claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting enjoying thereof, to wit, as long as the heavens were above the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the Verses preceeding, and subsequent; which the Israelites never performed. And therefore they could not hope for other than all mankind could or can expect; who knew that all sorts of comforts from the merciful goodness of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, then while we persevere in his love, service, and obedience. So in the eighth Verse of the eleventh of Deuteronomy, the keeping of Gods Commandments was a condition joynted to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written; Therefore shall ye keep all the Commandments which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and go in, and possess the Land, whither ye go to possess it. Also that you may prolong your days in the Land which the Lord swore unto your fathers, &c.

The like condition was also annexed to the enjoying of the Land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the heavens were above the earth. For if ye keep diligently, saith he, all these commandments, which I command you to do, that is, to love the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and ye shall possess great Nations, and mightier than you. And here, though it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandments, and their falling away from the worship of his allpowerful Majesty, to the Idolatry of the Heathen, the conditional promises of God were absolutely void, as depending upon obedience unperformed: yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Metancthon: For, saith he, Offendit promissionem precipuam non esse de hoc politico Regno; He sheweth that his chief promise is not of a civil Kingdom. To which agrees that answer which S. Hierome made to a certain Heretick in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused S. Hierome, that he overthrew the reputation of the Jews Story, and brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam amittaxat viventium terram quæ in cælis est; (that is) *Only to that land of the living which is in heaven. Quoniam tota Judeorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambin, ut vix longitudinem habeat 160. miliarium, latitudinem vero 40. & in his etiam regiones, loca, urbes, & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam à Judeis occupata, sed tantum divina pollicitationis promissa; Because the whole Countrey of the Jews is so narrow in compass, that it scarce hath 160. miles in length, and 40. miles in breadth, and in these are countries, places, cities, and many towns, which the Jews never possessed, but were only granted by divine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh upon Esay, touching the blessings promised unto Hierusalem, where he hath these words: *De quo diximus Hierusalem nequaquam in Palestina regione petendam, qua totius Provincie, determinata est: & saxosis montibus asperata, & penuriam patitur sitis: ita in celestibus ubi pluvius, & raritatem fontium solum extraxione solvitur: sed in Dei manibus, ad quam dicitur, signaverunt fructores tui; From whence, saith he, we learn, that Hierusalem is not to be sought in that region of Palestina, which is the worst of the whole Province, and ragged with craggy mountains, and suffereth the penury of thirst: so as it preceiveth rain water, and supplieth the scarcity of Wells by building of cisterns; but this *Hierusalem

Jerusalem is in Gods hands, to which it is said, Thy builders have fastened: so far St. Hierome; where also to prevent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himself: Neque hoc dico in suggestionem terræ Judææ, ut hæreticus Sycophanta munitur: aut quo asseram historiam veritatem, quæ fundamentum est intelligentiæ spiritualis: sed ut decantiam supercilium Judæorum, qui Synagogæ angustias latitudini Ecclesiæ præferunt: Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum eviscantem, offendant terram promissionis laxe & melle manentem; Neither (saith he) say I this to disgrace the land of Judæa, as the heretical Sycophant doth belie me: or to take away the truth of the history, which is the foundation of spiritual understanding: but to beat down the pride of the Jews, which enlarge the straits of the Synagogue farther than the breadth of the Church: For if they follow only the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them shew the Land of promise, flowing with Milk and Honey.

By this it may also be gathered, howsoever it be unlikely (seeing the West-bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the literal sense, that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the East-bound, should be taken only in a spiritual sense) yet nevertheless that Hierom's opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be understood for Euphrates, and that the promise it self was never so large: much less the plantation and conquest of Israël.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land because Asher, Nephthim, and Zabulon held the Northernmost part, and were seated in Phœnicia, I will begin with these three, taking Asher for the first: of which Tribe yet before I spake, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names, by reason of the divers fancies of Translators, are diversely exprest, so that to the unskillfull they may seem divers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diversity (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly because the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew Editions have; and partly, because the Ancient exprest omitted divers consonants; otherwise than the later do think fit.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

§. I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

THe Asherites descended of Asher the son of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500. and odd persons, all men above twenty years of age, and able to bear arms, at the time when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Deserts, there remained of their issues, besides women and children, 53400. bodies, fit for the wars: which past the river of Arnon into the Plains of Moab, and after the conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phœnicia, from Zidon and the fields of Libanus, unto Ptolomais Acon alongst the Sea-coast, containing thirty English miles, or thereabout: and from the Mid-land Sea to the East border some twelve miles: though Antoninus makes it some what larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitful, abounding in Wine, Oyl, and Wheat, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophecy, Apir pinguis panis: Concerning Asher, his bread shall be fat: And he shall give pleasures for a King.

§. II.

of Zidon.

THe first City seated on the North border of the Territory of Asher, was Zidon, which Joshua calleth the great Zidon, both for strength and magnitude. The Greeks and Curtius make Agenor the founder thereof: and Justine derives the name from the abundance of fish found on those shores: whereof it hath been called Zidonia. But that it was far more ancient, Moses, Joshua, and Josephus witness, the same being found: by Zidon the eldest of Canaan's sons: and so strong it was in Joshua's time, as neither did himself attempt it, neither could the Asherites, or any of their successors master it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, even unto the coming of Christ: a City interchangeably governed, by their own Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets, Ely, Hieremie, Ezechiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted, both by the enemies enemies Sword, and by the Pestilence. Zidon is seated on the very wall of the Phœnician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterranean or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the City of Berythus, and the River Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat, which standeth between it and Tyre: the distance between which two great and famous Cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14. thousand paces, saith Seiglerus: but Padianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Weissburg in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs, make five and twenty miles. This difference of distance as well between these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it over-difficult to divide any new Scale to the Map and Description of the Holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agenor's time there is no memory: the story which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time consumed and lost. It seemeth to be more ancient than Tyre; which was also built by the Zidonians. For as Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memory of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon; and a City subject to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacy, and became far more renowned, populous, and strong. From Zidon had Solomon and Zorobabel their principal workmen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other Mechanical Arts or Trades: the Prophet Zachary calling them the wise Zidonians. The City was both by nature and art exceeding strong, having a Castle or Citadell on the North-side, standing upon an unaccessible Rock, and compassed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order; and another Castle it hath on the South-side by the Port of Egypt, which the Templars guarded. It also lent many other Colonies beside that of Tyre, into places remote; as unto Thebes, and Sephera, Cities of Ægypt; in Greece, Strabo and Pliny give the Zidonians the invention of Glass, which they used to make of those Sands which are taken out of the River Belus, falling into the Mediterranean Sea, near Ptolomais, or Acon; and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those clear Glasses which they make at Murano: of which St. Hierom and Pliny: Zidon ingenuit vitrefactum: Zidon vitrarum officinam nobilis: Zidon a famous Glass-maker, or a skilful worker in Glass-houses. They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astarte: which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan (as Pineda gathers out of 1 Sam. 31. 10. and Judg. 10. 6.) yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the gods of the Zidonians: as appears 1 Reg. 11. 5. in the story of Solomon's Idolatry: where Astarte is called the god of the Zidonians: and 1 Reg. 16. 33. in the story of Achab, the chief worshipper of Baal, where it is said, that he marrying Jezabel the daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Divers Baals and divers Astartes in their idolatry they acknowledged: as it appears by the plural names of Baalim, and Astartes, 1 Sam. 12. 10. and elsewhere; for even the name Astarte, as I am informed by a skillful Hebræan, is plural; the singular being Ashoreth: whence Judg. 2. 13. the Septuagint read ἀστροθήνη ἡ ἀστροθήνη. They worshipped the Astartes. The occasion of their this multiplying of their Baals and Ashoreths, may be diversely understood: either in respect of the diversity of the forms of the Images, or of the worship in divers places, or of the stories depending upon them: which (as fables use to be) were doubtless in divers Cities divers. Augustine quest. 19. in Judg. thinks Baal and Astarte to be Jupiter and Juno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrrians) call Juno by such a name as Astarte. Tully, lib. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making divers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Astarte: whom he makes to be born of Tyris and Syria, and to have been the wife of Adonis: as also Macrobius, 2. Saturn. cap. 21. says, that Adonis was with great veneration commonly worshipped of the Affrians: and Hierome upon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewail) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seem that in the worship of Astarte or Venus, they did bewail her husband Adonis: as also the Grecians did in their songs of Adonis: Mourning for Adonis the fair, dead is Adonis the fair. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifice of Isis: whose loss of her Husband Osiris, was as famous in the Egyptian Idolatry, as with the Grecians, Venus loss of Adonis. And to this agreeeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride; that Osiris with the Egyptians is called Amunus; which word may seem to be the same with Ezekiel's Thammuz. But howsoever these Zidonians were thus antiently fostered with the milk of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receive the Doctrine of the Gospel of Christ after his Ascension, than the Jews: who had been taught by Moses and the Prophets so many years, whereof our Saviour in Matthew and Luke: Woe be to thee Corazin, &c. for if the great works which were done in thee, had been done in Tyrus and Zidon, they had repented long ago, &c. but I say unto you, it shall be easier for Tyrus and Zidon, at the day of judgment, than for you.

It received a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Dioceses of Tyre. But in the year of our Redemption 626, it fell into the hands of the Saracens, and continued in their possession till Baldwin the first, then King of Hierusalem: in the year 1111, by the help of the Danes and Normans, who came with a Fleet to visit the Holy Land, and took Port at Joppa, it was again recovered, the commandment thereof being given to Eustace Gremer, a Noble man of that Country. And again in the year 1250, it was re-edified and strengthened by Isidore the French King: while he spent four year in the War of the Holy Land. Lastly, in the year 1289, it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turks, and hath the name of Zai.

§. III.

Of Sarepta, with a brief History of Tyre in the same Coast.

Sarepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarpath, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between it and the River called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent Wine growing near it: of which Sidonius:

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna, Quaque Sareptano paluvie missa bibas.

I have no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine, Nor any for the drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This City had also a Bishop, of the Dioceses of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turks, as the rest: and is now called Saphet, faith Possellus.

Nor far from Sarepta was situate that sometime famous City of Tyre, whose fleets of ships commanded, and gave the law over all the Mediterræan Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatness and power, the Tyrans erected Utica, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil, Urbis

*antiqua fuit, Tyrii tenuere Coloni, Carthago, And Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colony of the Phœnicians. In Spain they founded Gades, now Cadiz. In Italy, Nola: in Asia the less Dromos Achilles, which City the Scholiast of Apollonius placeth near the River Phyllis, in Bythinia.*

It had antiently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Isaiah the 23. taking name from the situation; because built on a high Rock, sharp at one end. The Latines, as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra; for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Ostrum Sarranum, by which name Juvenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it upon a high hill, whereof many ruins remain to this day; the place being still known by the name of the antient Tyre: and because it was a Colony of the Zidonians, the Prophet Esay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon; which Trogus also confirmeth, though Berosus by affinity of name makes Thiras the son of Japhet to be the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very antient (for so much the Prophet Esay also witnesseth, Is not this your glorious City, whose antiquity is of antient days?) yet that Thiras the son of Japhet set himself in the bosom of the Canaanites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region, I see nothing to persuade me.

But that new Tyre in after-times so renowned, seemeth to be the work of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curtius: and Josephus and Eusebius make this City elder than Solomon's Temple 240 years: Cædrenus 261, who also addeth, that Tyrus the wife of Agenor, gave it her name: but of Agenor I will speak more at large in the story of their Kings.

For strength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receive Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Island 700. paces from the Continent; and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the midst of the Seas, as some read, or as others, in the inner-most part of the Sea, whence he called it Scituata at the entry of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it, the Mart of the people for many Isles: and Esay, a Mart of the Nations: and so proud, wealthy, and magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Esay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World.

It excelled both in learning, and in manufacture: especially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, faith Julius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dog, who passing along the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Conchilis or Purpura, the the whist of his lips became of that colour. It worshipped the Idols that Zidon did: saving that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrans presented him with a Crown of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remain his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their City; and the Ancestor of the Macedonian Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountain of old Tyre: where he might perform that ceremony. But this availed not: for Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious; he desired to enter the Town, which being denied, he, as one whom no peril could fear, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ships as he could, and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, & so many weighty stones from the old City of Tyre adjoining, as notwithstanding that his materials were often waisted away with the strength of the Sea and the Tides, yet he never rested, till he had made a foot-passage from the Continent to the Island: and having once approached their walls, he overtopped them with Towers of wood, and other frames: from whence (having filled the body of force with the violent moving spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the sword that resisted; after which, he caused 2000. more to be hung up in a rank all alongst the Sea-shore: which execution upon cold blood he performed (as some Authors affirm) upon the issues of those slaves which had formerly slain all their Masters, taking their Wives, Children, Riches, and power of Government to themselves. This victory of Alexander over the Tyrans, Josephus remembereth: and how Sababall revolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Souldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Provincial Governour, which Darius seated in Samaria: the same who having married his Daughter to Manasse, brother to Jaddas the high Priest of Hierusalem; obtained of Alexander, that a Temple might be built on the Mountain Garrim over Samaria: that the forces of the Jews being divided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his son in law Manasse, whom the Jews oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sababall, whom Guil. Tyrius called Sanaballa, died.

Long before this desolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmandasser the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became envious of the beauty, riches, and power of that city. He besieged it both on the Land-side, and with three-score ships of war held the Port: to the end that neither any victuals nor any supply of men might enter it: but the Tyrans with twelve sail scattered that fleet, and took 500. prisoners of the Assyrians: notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his resolution, and lay before it by his Lieutenants five years, but with ill success. And this siege Menander Epiphanius, cited by Josephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as he found the story among the Annals of the Tyrans (which the Annals converted into Greek) adding, that Euhelus, whom Tyrus called Heliplus was then King of Tyre, having governed the same six and twenty years. Soon after this repulse of Salmandasser and about 2000. years before the victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonosor, at such time as he destroyed Hierusalem with the Temple, came before this City: who indeed gave to Alexander the example of that despairful work, of joining it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonosor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the strength of the Sea, the same cawley and passage was again broken down, and demolished.

Against Nabuchodonosor, for many years, the Tyrans defended themselves: for so long did those Babylonians continue before it. As every head was made bald, and every shoulder made bare, faith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Esay had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proud place. In the end, and after 13. years siege or more, the Tyrans despoiled of all their hopes, and remembering over-late the predictions and threatenings of Gods Prophets, having prepared a convenient number of ships, abandoned their City, transporting with themselves the ablest of all that remained: and with their wives, children, and portable riches, fled thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritime Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: so as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to satisfy so many labours and perils, or any person upon whom to avenge themselves for the loss of so many bodies in that War: It pleased God in recompence thereof (who strengthened this resolution, as in a work of his own) to make Nabuchodonosor victorious over the Egyptians: and gave him that Kingdom and the spoil thereof, as it were, in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hieron saith, that God leaveth not not the good deeds of the Heathen unrewarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attain unto that eternal happiness reserved for his servants and Saints: yet such is the boundless goodness of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporal blessings.

Now of this enterprise of Nabuchodonosor's against Tyre, prophapely Historians have not been silent. For both Diocles, and Philostratus (as Josephus citeth them) the one in his second Book, the other in his Phœnician Histories remember it.

After these two great Vastations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon, this City of Tyre, repaired and recovered it self again: and continued in great glory about 300. years, even to the coming of our saviour Christ: and after him flourished in the Christian Faith near 600. years: the Archbishops whereof gave place to none but to the Patriarch of Hierusalem onely, who within his own Diocess had fourteen great Cities, with their Bishops and Suffragans: namely Caipha, otherwise Porpharia, Acon, or Plomaise, Sarepta, Zidon, Cesarea, Beitry, Berytus, Syblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthofia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus, (or Torfofa) and Maraclea. But in the year 636. it was with the rest of that beautiful Region of Phenicia and Palestina, subjected to the cruel and faithless Saracens: under the burthen and yoke of whose tyranny it suffered, with the other Palestine Cities, 488. years.

In the year 1112. it was attempted by Baldwin King of Hierusalem; but in vain yet in the year 1124. by Guaremonde, Patriarch of Hierusalem, Vicegerent to Baldwin the second, with the assistance of the Venetians, and their fleet of Gallies, it was again recovered, and subjected to the Kings of Hierusalem, and so it remained 165. years.

Finally, in the year 1189, Saladine having first taken Hierusalem, removed his whole Army, and sat down before Tyre: drawing his fleet of Ships and Gallies from Alexandria into the Port, this City as then only remaining in the Christian power.

The Citizens finding themselves reduced into great famine, and many other miseries, they at once with certain rafters of timber, fixed, burnt, and brake the Saracens fleet, and sallied out resolutely upon his Army, slew so great numbers of them; and followed their victory with such fury, as that the Saracens foraking their Trenches and Tents removed in great disorder and dishonour. Two years after which victory the body of that famous Frederick Barbarossa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christians' enemies over a River unfordable perished by the weight of his armour there-

n) was brought and interred in the Cathedral Church of Tyre; neer unto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garnished and graven with gilt pillars of Marble, 940. years before therein buried: but in the year 1289. the Saracens again attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subject to the Turks.

§. IV.

Of Ptolomais or Acon.

THe third City alongst the coast of the Sea, which the Afferites could not obtain, on the South bound of Affer was Acho, which was the antient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authours affirm, that it took name from Acnon the brother of Ptolomee. Pliny calleth it Ac: and otherwise the Colony of Claudianus. It had also the name of Coth, or Cod, and by Zeiglerus it is called Hæzipo.

But lastly, it was intituled Ptolemaie, after the name of one of the Egyptian Ptolomies; which City also, as it is I Mac. 11. another, of the Ptolomies, infideliously wrested from his son in law Alexander, which called him self the son of Antiochus Epiphanes: the same Alexander having married Cleopatra, daughter of the said Ptolomie, not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Maccabaeus treacherously surpris'd and slain, as it is I Mac. 12. 48. by the perfidiousness of Tryphon, whom soon after Antiochus pursued, as it is in the Story ensuing: and, by like reason, about the same time was the aforesaid Alexander in the war against Demetrius, one of the sons of Antiochus the great, with whom Ptolomy joyned, overthrowen and treacherously murdered by Zabdiel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented unto his father in law Ptolomie: who enjoyed not the glory of his victory and treason above three daies, for God struck him by death.

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his regal seat; two parts of the same being invironed by the Sea, and the Port, for safety and capacity, not inferior to any other in all that Tract. This City is distant from Hiersusalem some four and thirty miles: four miles to the North from the Mountain Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lambertii: from Tyre, Antiochus maketh it two and thirty Italian miles.

CHAP. VII.

'miles. In the midst of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple of Bel-zabub; and therefore called the Castle of Flier, on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetual light like unto that called Pharus in Egypt: to give comfort in the night to those ships which came near and sought that part. It had in it a Bishop's seat of the Diocese of Tyre, after it became Christian: but in the year 636. (a fatal year to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Haomarus the Saracenen. In the year 1104. it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the help of the Gallies of Genoa: to whom a third of the revenue was given in recompence. Again, in the year of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred fourcore and seven, Saladine King of Egypt and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the year of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninety and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was possessed and redelivered to the Christians. Lastly, in the year 1291. it was by the fury of the Saracens besieged with an Army of 150000. entered, sack'd, and utterly demolished: though in some sort afterward reedified, and it is now Turbij.

||. V:

Of the Castle of Saint George.

Five miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is a Castle of St. George seated, in which he was born: the Valley adjoining bearing the same name. And though for the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon leave every man to his own belief: yet I cannot but think, that if the Kings of England had not some more probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successors royally have continued, should have born his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those daies, as that the English were driven to make such an erection upon a fable, or person feigned. The place is described by Adricomius in his description of Affer, to have been in the fields of Libanus, between the River Adonis, and Zidon: his own words are these: Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, non longe à Beryto, memorat inclytum Christi Militem D. Georgium, Regis filium ab immensissimo Dracone asseruisse: eamque maculatam patrisi reposituisse. In cuius rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum fuit edificata. In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not far from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ, Saint George, did rescue the Kings daughter from a huge Dragon: and having killed the beast, delivered the Virgin to her Parent. In memory of which deed a Church was after built there: Thus far Adricomius. His Authors he citeth Lodovicus Romanus, Patric. Navigationum l. i. c. 3. and Bridenbach l. iii. 5. The Valley under this Castle sometime called Affer, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority suffice not, we may rather make the Story allegorical, figuring the victory of Christ, than except of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.

||. VI.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

Between Ptolomais and Tyre alongst the Sea-coast, was the strong City of Acziba, or Achazib, which S. Hierome called Aczibph, and Josephus Ecdippus, Plinie Ecdippa, one of those which defended it self against the Affrites. Belforst finds Acziba and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one; but I know not from whence he had it.

The twelve Scedars of the Land which Moses sent from Cadeshbarni, travelled as far ^{hieron de Lucifertus} to the North as Roob, or Rechoh, in the Tribe ^{Jof. Well.} of Affer, which Rechoh, as also Berabhe, which ^{Jud. i. 10} by Ezechiel, ^{cap. 47. ver. 16.} is placed in these ^{Plin. l. 5.} North borders, belonging in Davids time to the King Hadarbeker, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel, chap. 8. ver. 8. and chap. 10. ver. 6. and it defended it self against the Afferites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achziph, Ptolemais, Alab, Helbah, and Apbek, did.

This Aphek it was, whose wall falling down, slew leaven and twenty thousand of Benhadad's Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had been slaughtered by the Israelites, under the conduct of Abab. Here Junius hints that the Philistines encamped a little before the battel at Gilboa, though in his note upon the first of Samuel the 9. & 11. he takes Aphek there mentioned (at which battel the Ark was taken) to have been in Juda. Of which Ios. 15. and 53. & in the second of King 13. 17. he reads, Fortiter, for in Aphek. 1 King. 10. Where others covert it, Percutious Syros in 1 Sam. 19. Aphek.

The next place alongst the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it when he besieged Tyre: and set it on a point of Land which extendeth it self into the Sea between Acziba and Tyre: which Castle Baldwin the first rebuilt and fortified; in the year of Christ 1157. when he undertook the recovery of Tyre.

Not much above a mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentiful Spring of water, which Solomon remembreth, called the Well of living Water: from whence not only all the fields and plains about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawn: but the same Spring, which hath not above a bow-foot of ground to travel till it recover the Sea, driveth six great Mills in that short passage, saith Brochard.

Within the Land, and to the East of Acziba, and Sandalinum, standeth Hofa: and beyond it, under the Mountains of Tyre, the City of Acheph, or Axah, or after S. Hierome, Acisph, a City of great strength, whose King, amongst the rest, was slain by Jesaja, at the waters of Merom.

Of Thoron, Gisgala, and some other places.

Further into the Land, towards Jordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Santo Abdemare built on the Eastermost hills of Tyre, in the year 1107. thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adjoining being very fruitful, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the story of the Wars for the recovery of the Holy Land, derive their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappel, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Humphrey of Thoron, Countable to Baldwine the 3. King of Jerusalem, lieth buried: There were five Castles besides this within the Territory of Affer: whereof four are seated almost of equal distance from each other: to wit, Captrum, Lamperti, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Captrum Regium and Belfort: the first neer the Sea under the hills of Saron, the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and fellowship of the Teutonic, or Dutch Knights (by which they defended themselves, and gave succour to other Christians at such time as the Saracens possesst the best part of the upper Galilee) the chief of which Order was in Ptolomaeus Acon. The first fortress was for beauty and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground upon the River Naar, neer the City Rama: of which in this Tribe Jos. 19. 29. for which the Vulgar reads Horma: making the article a part of the word, and mistaking the vowels: from the siege of this Castle of Belfort, the great Saladin King of Syria and Egypt, was by the Christians Army raised, and with great loss and dishonour repulsed.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong City of Alab (or Achlab) which S. Hierome calleth Chalab, one of those that defended themselves against Affer, as Roob (or Rechob) not far thence did.

Towards the South from Roob they place Gabala (which Herod furnished the Alcalanite rebuilt) making it of the Territory of Chabul, Quod Syrorum lingua displicere significat (saith Weissenburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre was ill pleased with those twenty Cities, seated hereabout, which Solomon presented unto him in recompence of those provisions sent him for the building of the Temple: Others think this Chabul (or Chabul) containing a circuit of those twenty Cities given to Hiram, to have been without the compass of the Holy Land, though bordering Affer on the North side: as it is said, 1 Reg. 9. 11. That they be in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the Country: for as it was not lawful, say they, to give to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israelites: howsoever, that after Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appears, 2 Chron. 8. 14. And it seems they were conquered by David from the Syri Rechabee, whose City Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

Almost of equal distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Gisgala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed over Jordan: Gisgala was made famous by John the son of Levi, who from a mean estate gathering together four hundred Thieves, greatly troubled all the upper Galilee, at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Judas: by whose practice Josaphus, who then commanded in the upper Galilee, was greatly endangered: whereof himself hath written at large, in his second Book of those Wars. This John betraying, in all he could, the City of Gisgala (whereof he was native) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the City, gave opportunity, during the contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarims, to surprise it: who at the same time forc't it, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Josaphus authority rebuilt, it was afterward rendered to Titus by composition. They finde also the Cities of Eana Major, and * Cades (or Gadseff) of the first was that Syro-phenician, whose Daughter Christ delivered of the evil spirit. Necr the other, they say, it was that Jonathas Machabeus overthrew the Army of Deme-trius.

There are, besides these fore-named Cities, within the Tribe of Affer, divers others: as on the South border, and near the Sea, Misell, or Misphal: within the Land (a) Begara, (b) Bethdagon, and Bethemec, standing on the South border between Affer and Zabulon: on the North side joyning to Syro-phenicia, is the City of Metthalon, or Cheshlon, the utmost of the Holy Land that way: under which, towards the Sea, is Chali, and then (c) Enoch, supposed to be built by Cain, and named of his son Enoch, but without probability, as I have formerly proved. There are others also besides these, as Ammon, or Chammon, of which Jos. 19. 28. where also we read of Nehel, Rama, Alamalec, and Beron: the Cities of Alcab, or Chelcab, Haddon, and Rechob, and Misphal, which we have already mentioned, were by the Affrites given to the Levites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mention is made, Jud. 1. 30. to which out of Jesaja we may add Ebron, Amhad, and others, on which no story dependeth; and therefore I will not pelt the description with them.

§. VIII.

Of the Rivers and Mountains of Affer.

The Rivers to the North of Affer, are Adonis, afterward Cant, to which Zeigler joyneth Lycus; Ptolomy, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea neer Berytus: which River of Leontis, Montanus draws near unto Zidon: finding his head notwithstanding where Ptolomy doth, between Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a River called Fons bortionum Libani, which Adrichome out of Brochard intitleth Eleutherus: for which he also citeth Pliny, and the first of Machabees: the eleventh Chapter; but neither of those authorities prove Eleutherus to be in Affer: for this River falleth into the Sea at the Isle of Aradus: not far from Balanea, witness Ptolomy: and therefore Pinetus calleth it Valantia, and Po-sellus, Yelana; which River boundeth Phenicia on the North-side: to which Strabo also agreeth: but this principal River of Affer, Arias Montanus calleth Gabatus. Christiana Chrot out of the mouth and papers of Peter Laican (which Laican in this our age both viewed and described the Holy Land) calleth the main River Fons bortionum Libani: and one of the streams which runneth into it from the North-side, Naar, and another from the South-west, Chabul: of the City adjoining of the same name: for Eleutherus it cannot be. There is also another River described by Adrichome, named Jephthael, which I find in no other Author, and for which he citeth Jos. 19. but the word Ghe, which is added there to Jephthael, is not taken for a River, but for a Valley: for a Valley the Vulgar, the Geneva, and Arias Montanus turn it. There is also found in Affer the River of Belus, remembered by Josaphus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, saith Pliny: out of the lands of this River are made the best Glafs, which sometimes the Zidonians practised: and now the Venetians at Admarana, Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chedunim, which it cannot be: for Belus is known to flow from out the Lake Geneve, as all Geographers, both Ancient and Modern, and the later Travellers into those parts witness. It is true that the River of Chifon taketh water from Chedunim, but not Ysd in that fashion which Montanus hath described it: neither doth it find the Sea at Ptolomaeus Acon, according to Montanus: but farther to the South between Caiphas and Sicaminum, witness Zeigler, Adrichome, and Schroet.

Besides these Rivers there are divers famous Springs and Fountains, as that of living waters adjoining to Tyre: and Maferophot, or after S. Hierome, Majerephotaim, whose Well filled by the flood of the Sea adjoining (they say) the Inhabitants by seething the water make salt thereof, as at Nantwich. The Mountains which bound Affer on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Celestria: two great ledges of Hills, which from the Sea of Phenicia and Syria, extend themselves far into the Land Eastward, 400. stadia, or furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length he giveth to the Valley of Celestria, which those Mountains inclose: but Pliny gives them 1500. furlongs in length from the West (where they begin at Thersiphon, or Desi facies, near Tripoli) to the Mountains of Arabia beyond Damascus: where Anti-libanus turneth towards the South. These ledges where they begin to part Traconitis and Basan, from the Desart of Arabia, are called Hermion: which Alfeg also nameth Sien, the Phenicians, Syrians; and the Amorites, Sanir; neither is this any one Mountain apart, but a continuation of Hills, which running farther Southerly, is in the Scriptures called Galaad, or Gilead: the same being fill a part of Libanus, as the Prophet this Para-

Strab. l. 10. Plin. l. 5. c. 10. Deut. 4. 48. Strab. l. 10. Plin. l. 10. c. 10. Hieremy

Hieremy proveth: Galaad in mibi caput Libani: noting, that this Galaad is the highest of those Hills of Libanus. Strabo knows them by the name of Tracoonite: and Ptolemy by Hippus. Arius Montanus calleth these Mountains bordering Affer; Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrary to all other Cosmographers, but he giveth no reason of his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, because (according to Tacitus) the highest of them are covered with snow all the Summer: the Hebrew word Libanos, (saith Weissenburg) signifieth whiteness. Others call them by that name of the Franchincence which those Trees yeild: because λευκόν is also the Greek word for that Gum.

Niger out of Aphrodisens affirmeth, that on Libanus there falleth a kind of honey dew, which is by the Sun congealed into hard Sugar, which the Inhabitants call Sacchar, from whence came the Latine word Saccarum.

The Rivers which Libanus bestoweth on the neighbour Regions, are, Chrysorrhoas, Jordan, Eleutherus, Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, Fons horionum Libani, and others.

The rest of the Mountains of Affer, are those Hills above Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitful: but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nebo, or the Mountain of Abaram in Reuben, Moses beheld Libanus threescore miles distant.

§. IV.

THE TRIBE OF NEPH TALIM.

§. I.

Of the bounds of Nephtalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

The next portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Affer, was the upper Galilee: the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Nephtalim, the son of Jacob by Billa, the hand-maid of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 53400. persons, able men to bear arms, numbered at Mount Sinai: all which leaving their bodies in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their sons, 45400. besides Infants, Women, and Children, under twenty years of age. The Land of Nephtalim took beginning on the North part, from the Fountains of Jordan, and the Hill of Libanus adjoining, as far South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Affer, and on the East and South-East by Jordan.

On the North-side of Libanus, and adjoining to this Territory of Nephtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabit, in which Tract, and under Libanus, was the city of Heliopolis: which the height of the Mountains adjoining shadowed from the Sun the better part of the day. Fossellus calls it Baalce; Niger, Marbech; and Leonclavius, Beallebece.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great cities in Egypt: the first called On, by the Hebrews, and the Chaldean Paraphrast; otherwise Bethsemes, or after the Latines, Solis oppidum, or Domus Solis; The City of the Sun: into which, saith Ulpian, Severus the Roman Emperour sent a Colony: the other Gesellus nameth Dealmarach: and of this name Stephannus also findeth a city in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also in the same Valley adjoining to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis of whom the region towards Palmyrena had the name of Chalcidica, over which Herod Agrippa, and Bernice the Queen commanded.

Abila also gave name to the region adjoining, of which Lysanias the son of Herod the elder, became Tetrarch or Governour: whereof Ptolemy gave it the addition of Lysani, and called it Abila Lysanii. Volaterran names it Abila, of which he notes, that one Abila Diogenes, a famous Sophister was native, who by Volaterran is intituled Apuleius, not Abilanus. After that this city of Abila or Abila, had received the Christian Faith, Priscillianus became the Bishop thereof: slain afterward by our British Maximus at Treuer. For distinction of this city (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembered, that in the Tribe of Manasse, lying in adjoining upon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephtalim, there is another city of the same name, saving that it is written with an B for an A (and called Abela, remembered in the 20. chapter of the second of Samuel. The same Josephus calls Abelmachea, and Hierome, Bethmacha. In the place of Samuel, for distinction sake, it is written Abel Beth-Mabaca, (for belike it was the Town of Mabaca the wife of Macir, the son of Manasse, the father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Majim. This city Joab besieged, because Seba the son of Bichri, who rebelled against David, fled thierinto for succour: but a certain wild woman of the city perfwading the people to cast Seba his head over the wall, Joab retired his Army. The same city was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglaphalsar. The

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signifie bewailing, or a plain ground; and therefore no marvel that many Towns (with some addition for distinction sake) were thus called: for even of bewailing, many places took name; as Bochim, Judg. 2. 4. and so doubtless Abel-Masfaim, Gen. 50. 11. and yet Junius in his notes upon Nam. 33. 49. thinks that Abel-Sittim was so called, rather by reason of the plain ground there; (to wit, in the Land of Moab) and so perhaps Abel-Bacholab in the Tribe of Ephraim: the Town of Elisha the Prophet: also Abel-Venearum of the Ammonites; whither Jephtha pursued them.

§. II.

Of Hazor.

IN the Tribe of Nephtalim was that famous City of Jabin, in Joshua's time called Azor, (or after the Chaldean Paraphrast, Hazor) by Josephus; Azra; by Junius, * Chazor: which Lactantius names Hefron; the Regal City, and Metropolis of Canaan, seated in the West part of Nephtalim towards Affer. In this city was that great Rendevous and Assembly of those four and twenty Kings against Joshua: who being all overthrown, slain, and scattered, this their powerful city was by Joshua taken and burnt to dust. But in process of time the same being re-built by the Canaanites, a second King Jabin, 137. years after the death of this first Jabin, invaded the Israelites: and being ordained of God to punish their Idolatry, he prevailed against them, and held them in a miserable servitude 20. years; till Deborah the Prophetess overthrew Sisera, Jabin's Lieutenant, and his Army, near the Mountain Tabor. This city Solomon restored at such time as he also re-edified Gaza, burnt by Pharao of Egypt, with Megidda, Bethoron, and other cities; but about 260. years after, it fell into the hands of Teglaphalsar, King of the Affrians. It is now, saith Adricomini, called Antiochia: it was one of the principal cities of Decapolis. There is another city of this name in the Territory of Benjamin, seated on the confines of Ascalon, called the new Hazor, saith Hierome.

§. III.

Of Casarea Philippi.

Here was also on the border, and within the Territory of Nephtalim, that renowned city of Lais, or Lajsch, as Junius writes it, or Leichen; which city the children of Dan (being strained in their Territory under Juda) invaded and mastered; and gave it the name of their own Parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Genes. 14. at which place Abraham surprised Chedorlaomer and his confederates, and followed his victory as far as Sobah, formerly remembred in the division of Syria, otherwise called Sophena. And after the possession of the Danites, it had the joynr name of Leichen-Dan. Weissenburg writes it Lacis, the Geneva, Lajsch, Jolephus, Dana, Benjamin, Balina; Breidenbach, Belena; but the now Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina to this day: witness Neubrigenfis, Tyrris, Volaterranus, Brachard the Monk, and Fossellus: who also taketh this city to be the same, which in Matth. 15. 39. in the Vulgar is called Magedan, for which the Greek Text hath Magdala in that place, and in S. Mark, speaking of the same story, Dalmanutha. At such time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it seemeth that it was either a free city, of the alliance and confederacy of the Zidonians; or else subject unto the Kings thereof; for it is written Judg. 18. And there was none to help, because Lais was far from Zidon: and they had no business with other men: for it was above thirty English miles from the Mediterranean Sea, and from Zidon.

In after-times when these regions became subject to the state of Rome, it had the name of Panacas, from a Fountain adjoining so called: and therefore Ptolemy calls it Casarea Panica. Hegeffippus calls it Parninus, saith Weissenburg: but he had read it in a corrupt copy; for in Hegeffippus, set out by Badmus, it is written Paneum without an R: and at such time as Philip the son of the elder Herod, brother to Herod, Tetrarch of Galilee, became Governour of Tracoonitis, sometime Basana: this city was by him amplified and fortified; and both to give memory to his own name, and to flatter Tyberius Cesar, he called it * Casarea Philippi: and so it became the Metropolis, and head city of Tracoonitis, and one of the first cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa in the succeeding age greatly adorned; by him in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memory of his impiety: so in S. Hieroms time the Citizens remembered their former Panacas, and so re-called it, with the Territory adjoining by the ancient name. Of this City was that woman whom Christ healed of a bloody issue, by touching the hem of his garment with a constant Faith: who afterward, other Hamath, or Emath (being far removed, and beyond the fore-named Mountains, which inclose all those Lands which Israel ever had possession of) is that Emath, which is also called Iuræa, witness Stella and Laichan; and not that in Nephthalim, where Jonathan Maccabees attended the Army of Demetrius, who fled from him, and removed by night,

For though Traconitis be comprehended within Iuræa (and therefore it is said to be junima Galilee Gentium) yet it hath beginning over the Mountains Traconis, and so it stretcheth into the Plains of the Territory of Iuræa; whence Philip the brother of Herod was Tetrarch, or President, both of Iuræa and Traconitis: both which are over Jordan towards the East. But Chemath in Nephthalim, is on the West side of Jordan towards the Mediterranean Sea.

The Country Iuræa was so called of Jeshurun, one of the sons of Israel; it is placed in the bounds of Celestria, and Arabia the Desert.

The people Iuræi were valiant and warlike men, and excellent Archers: Of whom Virgil:

Iuræos Taxi torquentur in arcus.

Of Eugh the Iuræans bows were made.

This City Chemath, or Hamath in Nephthalim, seems to have been as ancient as the other in Iuræa, both built by Amathus the eleventh son of Canaan. Whether in the time of David, this, or the other had Tobu for King, it is not certain; for Hamath or Emath beyond the Mountains, and Hamath in Nephthalim, were both neighbours to Damascus: of whose subjugation Tobu rejoiced, because Hadadaser, whom the Damasceni came to help, was his enemy. This Tobu fearing the strength and prosperity of David, hearing of his approach towards his Territory, bought his peace with many rich presents, and with many ancient vessels of gold, silver, and brass.

But it seemeth that David in such great success would not have had peace with Tobu, if he had been King of any place in Nephthalim; and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Toba: which King Solomon after his Fathers death made himself Master of, as a part of the lands (as in the larger and conditional promise) allotted by God to the children of Israel.

But this Hamath of Nephthalim, in the end, and after divers mutations and changes, both of name and fortune, being, as it hath been said, possessed by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was called Epiphania.

While S. Hierome lived, it remained a City well peopled, known to the Syrians by the name Amathe, and to the Greeks by Epiphania.

S. VI.

Of Reblatha & Rama, and divers other Towns.

IN the border of Hamath or Emath, towards Jordan, standeth the City Reblatha, or Ribla, watered from the fountain Daphnis: which falleth into the Lake of Merom. Hereunto was Zedekias brought prisoner, after his surprize in the fields of Jericho: & delivered to Nebuchodonosor: who to be avenged of Zedekias's infidelity, beyond the proportion of piety, first caused the Princes his children to be slain in his presence: and to the end that this miserable spectacle might be the last that ever he should behold in this world, and so the most remembered, he commanded both his eyes presently to be thrust out: & binding him in Iron chains, he was led a slave to Babylon, in which state he ended his life. Of which seldom exampled calamity, though not in express words, Jeremy the Prophet foretold him in Hierusalem not long before: But Ezekiel thus directly speaking in the person of God; I will bring him to Babel, to the Land of the Chaldeans, yet shall he not see it, though he shall die therein.

There are, besides these before remembered, many other strong Cities in Nephthalim, as that which is called (a) Cedes; there are two other of the same name, one in (b) Jasachar, another in Juda, of which Jos. 15. 23, and therefore to distinguish it, it is known by the addition of (c) Nephthalim, as Jud. 4. 11 is seated on a high hill, whence Jos. 20. 7. Keleth in Galilee in monte Nephthali: Josaphat which calls it Cedes; and in S. Hieromes time it was called Cidissus. Belfore greatly mistakes this Cedes, and confounds it with Cades in the Desert of Pharan.

After the King thereof, among other of the Canaanites, perished by the hand of Josua, it was made a City of refuge, and given to the Levites. Herein was Barac born; who overthrew the Army of the second Jabin of Hazor, at the Mount Tabor. It was sometime possessed by Teglatphalaser, when he wasted all Nephthalim: afterward by the Romans, and numbered for one of the ten Cities of the Decapolis Region: When it had imbraced the Christian faith; it was honoured with a Bishops seat, but in time it fell with the rest into the

the power of the Saracens and Turks, and by them it was demolished.

From Cedes some four Italian miles towards the South-west, standeth Sephet, otherwise Zephet, which was also one of the ten Decapolis Cities: a place exceeding strong, and for many years the inexpugnable Fortrefs of the Christians, and afterward of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour Cities of those Regions, both In-land and Maritimae, near it. Touching Rama of Nephthalim, seated Northward near Sephet, this is to be noted, that there are (d) divers places of this name in Palestine, all situated on hills: and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebrais excellens; Ramah with the Hebrews is high). Also that from this Rama, Jos. 19. 36, they read Arama, making the Article (which it hath in the Hebrew, as being a name of divers Towns) to be a part of the word: whence casting away the aspiration, they read Arama. From Sephet towards the West, they place * Bethsames, of which Jos. 19. 38, which defended it self against Nephthalim, Jud. 1. 33, but paid them tribute. On the other side of Sephet, towards the East, was Bethanath, who also kept their City from the Nephthalims.

Adjoining to which standeth Carthan, (d) or Kiriathbajim, a City of the Levites, not far from the Mountain out of which the Springs of Capharnaum arise, called Mons Christi, a place by our Saviour often frequented: as also then when calling his Disciples together, he made choice of twelve, which he called and ordained to be his Apostles or Messengers: of which place, or the acts therein done, there is often mention in the (e) Evangelists.

Adjoining to these are Magdale, a place of strength, (f) and Majethab, of which we read, that it was forced by Bacchides in the time of the (g) Maccabees: also (according to Adrichomius) one of the two Berotha's of Nephthalim. For Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this Tribe, (h) one near Chemath in the North border, of which Ezek. 47. 6, another (upon a weak conjecture out of Jos. 19. 33, ant. 1. 5. c. 2) he therefore placeth in this tract near the waters of Merom; because the Kings that joyed with Jabin against Josua, which incamped at the waters of Merom, Jos. 11. 5, are by Josaphat said to have encamped at the City Berotha in Galilee, not far from Cedes superior, which is also in Galilee: all which may be true of that Berotha of which Ezek. 47. 6, seeing it is in that Galilee which is called I deny not but that there was another Kiriathbajim in Rubens, of which Jos. 13. 9, e. *Mark 3. led the upper Galilee, or Galilee of the Gentiles. The same Adrichomius placeth the Region of Berim near Abela (of which Abela, or Abel-Beth Maabach, we have spoken already) this he doth upon a conjecture touching the place, 2 Sam. 20. 14, where some read Abel & Bethmaabach, & omnia loca Berim: but the better reading is, & omnes Berim, that is, with all the Berai: for Shebah being of Benjamin (in which Tribe also there is a City called Berotha, or Beeroth) drew the men of that City after him.

To the North of Berotha of Nephthalim standeth Sebarim under Libanus, remembered by Ezek. 47, and Aroseth gentium, near the Jad. 4. 2 waters of Merom, or Samochonitis, the City Lytt. in of Sifara, Lieutenant of the Army of the 1. 2. 3. 4. 5. 6. 7. 8. 9. 10. 11. 12. 13. 14. 15. 16. 17. 18. 19. 20. 21. 22. 23. 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. 31. 32. 33. 34. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39. 40. 41. 42. 43. 44. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51. 52. 53. 54. 55. 56. 57. 58. 59. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 65. 66. 67. 68. 69. 70. 71. 72. 73. 74. 75. 76. 77. 78. 79. 80. 81. 82. 83. 84. 85. 86. 87. 88. 89. 90. 91. 92. 93. 94. 95. 96. 97. 98. 99. 100.

cond Jabin: from whence not far off, towards the Sea of Galilee, is Edrai, or Edrebi, a strong City: besides many others, whereof I find no particular story of importance: as Ser in Jos. 19. 20. 25, called Triddim-Tzer, and named for the first of their fenced Cities: whence they make two Cities, Affidim and Ser. Then Adama, which they call Edama: also Hion, which they call Abion, of which in the books of Kings. Then the strong City of Cinnereth, after called Gennecareth, whence we read of the Land and Lake of Gennecareth, the same Lake which is also called the Sea of Tiberias. In the body of the Land they place Galgala to the South border: of which place of this name, also divers others, named Jos. 19. 25, Uneca, or Chukkek Horem and Azanob-tabor (which they place towards the East parts) and out of the same place of Josua, Jerzon, Lakkum, Jepnael, Heleb, and (k) Raccath, which two last they place near Casarea Philippi: To these they add out of Josua, Nekeb, and Adami: for which two Junius readeth Fossa Adami, making it no Town, but a Ditch cast by some of Adami, as it seems; or at least the custody of which March or Limit belonging to the Town. To these out of Num. 34. 10, they add Seppana, which 1 Sam. 30. 21, seems to be called Sipmoth. As Josua thinks that it is the same with Kerthan (one of these being made of the other by transposition of letters) of which he fetcheth out of the Vulgar Translation, Tob. 7. 7, but in the Greek Text there is no sign, neither of the one nor of the other.

ready, that it is also Kirithbajim, 1 in the place, 1 Reg. 4. 15, which also they bring to prove that there was a City called Nephthalim, as is evident by the following Verses: the Tribe of Nephthalim is meant, and not any City of that name.

§. V.

THE TRIBE OF ZEBULON.

OF Zebulon, or Zebulon, another of the Sons of Jacob by Leah, there were mustered at Mount Sinai, 57400. able men, besides women, children, and aged unable persons: all which dying in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their issues 65000. fit to bear arms: who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Ashter to the River Chifon Southward, and from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediterranean East and West.

The Cities within this Tribe which border Ashter are Sicanimum on the Sea shores, of which Joseph. Ant. 13. c. 19. Debbaser, of * which Jof. 19. 11. Jekonum, or Jockneban, whose King was slain by Josaphat, and the City was given to the Levites: and Gaba, after called the City of Horfemen, of a Regiment there garison'd by Herod. Then the City, which beareth the name of Zebulon, or the City of men, exceeding ancient and magnificent, is burnt to the ground by Oefius, Lieutenant of the Roman Army. Adriaculus makes it the birth-city of (c) Elon Judge of Israel, because he is called Zebulonite: not marking that in the same place, he is said to be buried at Ajalon.

To the East of this City of Zebulon is Cathet, of which Jof. 19. 15. on the border of Ashter: and beyond it the lesser (d) Cana of Galilee, where Christ converted water into wine: the native City of Nathaniel, and, as it is thought, of Simon Zelotes. Beyond it begin the Mountains of Zebulon: and then the City of Cethron (in Zeigler, Ghiltron) which defended it self against Zebulon. Then Berfaba, which standeth in the partition of the upper and nether Galilee, fortified by Josephus against the Romans. Not far hence standeth Simron of Meron, whose King was slain by Josaphat.

Then Damma, or Dinma, a City of the Levites: then Noa, or rather Neba, of which Jof. 19. 13. Then Dothan, or Dothain, where Joseph found his brethren feeding their flocks: the same wherein Elizabas, besieged by the Syrians, struck them all blind.

Beyond it, towards the East, they imagine (c) Ambar, or Amathar: then Remmon of the Levites. The last of the Cities on the North border of Zebulon is Bethsaida, one of the ten Cities of Decapolis, situate on the Galilean Sea, and watered by the springs of Capharnaum, the native City of the Apostles, Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Herein Christ did many miracles, but these people being no less incredulous than the Capharnaum, and others, received the same Curse of threatened miseries, as Wo be unto thee Bethsaida, &c. Alongst the West border of Galilee, towards the South from Bethsaida, was the strong Castle of Magdala, the habitation of Mary Magdalen, not long since standing.

And beyond it the strong and high seated City of Josapata, fortified by Josephus in the Roman war: but in the end, after a long siege, surpris'd by Vespasian, who slaughtered many thousand of the Citizens, and held 1200. prisoners, whereof Josephus the Historian was one.

The last and greatest of the Cities on that Sea, and the Lake of Genezareth, within Zebulon, was that of Tiberias, from whence afterward the Galilean Sea also changed name, and was called the Sea of the City Tiberias, so named in the honour of Tiberius Caesar: it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapoli, and the greatest and last of the lower Galilee. From hence our Saviour called Mattheu from the Toll or Custom-house, to be an Apostle, and neer unto it raised the daughter of Tairus from death: it was built as Josephus reports by Herod the Tetrarch, the brother of Philip, in the beginning of the reign of Tiberius Caesar, in the most fruitful part of Galilee, but in a ground full of Sepulchres: Quem in iuxta nostras leges (with he) ad septem dies interjuxta habebatur, qui in talibus locis habitet: Whereas by our law he should be seven daies held as unclean, who inhabited in such a place: by which words, and by the whole place of Josephus it appears, that this Tiberias is not (as some have thought) the same as the old Cinnereth, which was seated, not in Zebulon, but in Nephthalim.

Neer unto this Tiberias, at Emanu, there were hot baths, where Vespasian the Emperor encamped against Tiberias. More into the Land toward the South-west, is Bethulia, seated on a very high hill, and of great strength, famous by the story of Holofernes and Judith, such as it is. Neer which standeth Bethleem of Zebulon: and adjoining unto it Capharath, fortified by Josephus against the Romans: and Japha, an exceeding strong place, afterward forced by Titus: who in the entrance, and afterward in fury slew 1000 of the Citizens, and carried away above two thousand prisoners.

On the South side are the Cities of Cariba of the Levites, and Gabara, of which Josephus as Justin thinks, that it is not that Japha of which we speak but now out of Josephus. Jideala, of which Jof. 19. 15. Hierome calls it Jadela: under it West-

Westward, Legio, (afterward a Bishops seat) and the City Belma, in ancient times exceeding strong, remembered Judith 7. 3. otherwise Chelma. Between Legio and Nazeret is the City Saffa, or Saffra, the birth-city of Zacharias, Alpheus, James and John: Then Sephoris, or Sephoris, according to Josephus: Sephorum according to Brocard: which afterwards, saith Hegesippus, and therone, was called Diocæsarea, the city of Ioachim and Anna the Parents of the Virgin Mary: it was called by Herod the Tetrarch, and by him, as Josephus speaks, made the head and defence of Galilee: in another place he saith, Urbinum Galilearum, maxima Sephoris & Tiberias. This Sephoris, greatly vexed Vespasian ere he went, Herod Antipas, when he made it the Regal seat of the nether Galilee, and surrounded it with a strong wall, called it Antocratorida, which is as much to say as Imperial, saith Josephus: and it is now but a Castle called Zafbat.

To the South-west of this Sephoris, or Diocæsarea, was that blessed place of Nazereth, the city of Mary the Mother of Christ: in which he himself was conceived: it standeth between Mount Tabor, and the Mediterranean Sea. In this city he abode chiefly four and twenty years, and was therefore called a Nazarene, as the Christians afterward were for many years. It was erected into an Archbishoprick in the following age. Neer unto it are the cities Buria afterward well defended against the Turks, and Nabalat, of which Jof. 19. 15. and Judg. 1. 30. where it is called Nabalot, and Jof. 21. 35. where it is a city of the Levites: near the Sea, adjoining to the River of Chifon is Saria, noted in Iosua for the uttermost of Zebulon.

In this Territory of Zebulon there are divers small Mountains: but Tabor is the most renowned, by the apparition of Moses and Elias: and by the Transfiguration of Christ in the presence of Peter, James, and John: unto whom Moses and Elias appeared; in memory whereof, on the top of the Mountain, the Empress Helen built a sumptuous Chappel.

In the chief River of Zebulon is Chifon, which rising out of Tabor, runneth with one stream Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with another stream Westward into the great Sea. This River of Chifon where it riseth, and so far as it runneth Southward, is called Chedumim, or Cadumim: and for mine own opinion, I take it to be the same which Ptolemy calleth chorfus: though others distinguish them, and set Chorfus by Cæsaria Palestine. There is a second Torrent or Brook that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Atagadum: and the third is a branch of a river rising out of the Fountains of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and near Atagadum, which Torrent they call Dothan, from the name of the city, from which it palleth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so joining with Jordanis parvus, which runneth from the Valley of Jephtha, which Iosua reckoneth in the bounds of Zebulon: it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

§. VI.

THE TRIBE OF ISSACHAR.

The next adjoining Territory to Zebulon, to the South and South-west, was Issachar, who inhabited a part of the nether Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increased in Egypt, as appeared by their numbers at mount Sinai, 54400. able and warlike men, who leaving their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land 64300.

The first city of this Tribe near the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberias eight English miles, or somewhat more; a city wherein the Jews (by the practice of a certain mutinous upstart, John the son of Levi) took arms against Josephus the Historian, then Governor of both Galilees. This city was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Jews, carried thence captive; and afterward with great difficulty by Vespasian, who entred it by the Sea side, having first beaten the Jews in a Sea-fight upon the Lake or Sea of Galilee: he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages; saving that his fury being quenched with the Rivers of blood running through every street, he referred the remainder for slaves and bond-men.

Next to Tarichea is placed Ceffion, or Ciffion of the Levites, and then Issachar, remembered in the first of Kings, c. 4. v. 17. then Abes, or Elets, Jof. 19. 20. and Remeth, of which Zeigler, Jof. 19. 21. otherwise Ramoth, 1 Chron. 6. 37. or Iermuth, Jof. 21. 19. this also was a city of the Levites, from whose Territory the Mountains of Gilboa take beginning: and range themselves to the Mediterranean sea, and towards the West as far as the City of Iezrael, Junias between which and Ramoth, are the cities of Issachar between which and Suna, he saith, that the Philistines incamped against Issachar, and afterward against Sani: a Land thirsty of blood, for for herein also, faith he, the Syrians with two and thirty Reguli assisting Benhadad, incouraged Achab, and were overthrowen and slaughtered: to whom the King of Israel made a most memorable answer, when Benhadad vaunted before the victory: which was, Tell Benhadad, Let not him that girdeth his harness boast himself as he that putteth it off: meaning, that glory followed after victory, but ought not to precede it. In the year following, in the fields, as they lay, adjoyning to this city, was the same vain-glorious Syrian utterly broken and discomfited by Achab: and 100000. footmen of the Aramesites, or Syrians, slain: before which overthrow the servants and counsellors of Benhadad (in derision of the God of Israel) told him, That the Gods of Israel were Gods of the Mountains: and therefore if they fought with them in the Plains, they should overcome them.

Under Aphec, towards the Sea, they felt the city of Ephreton, in the Plains of Galilee; called also the great field of Ephreton, and Mageddoo, in the border whereof are the ruins of Aphec to be seen, faith Brochard, and Breidenbach. After these are the cities of Cafaloth, of which 1 Mac. 9.2. Anem, of Hennannim, of the Levites, and Seffema, or Shabasma, the West border of Isachar, of which Iof. 19.22. From hence ranging the Sea coast, there is found the Castle of Pilgrims: a strong Castle, invironed with the Sea, sometime the storehouse and Magazine of the Christians, and built by the Earl of Saint Giles, or Toloufe.

From the Castle of Pilgrims, the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthest shore beginneth Mount Carmel, not far from the River Chifon, where Elijah assembled all the Prophets and Priests of Baal, and prayed King Achab, and the people assembled, to make trial whether the God of Israel, or the Idol of Baal were to be worshipped, by laying a sacrifice without fire on the Altar: which done, the Priests of Baal prayed, and cut their own flesh after their manner, but the fire kindled not, while Elijah in derision told them, that their God was either in pursuit of his enemies, not at leisure, or perchance asleep, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah the fire kindled, notwithstanding that he had caused the people to cast many vessels of water thereon: by which miracle the people incensed, slew all those Idolaters on the banks of Chifon adjoyning.

At the foot of this Mountain to the North, standeth Caiphas, built, as they say, by Caiphas the high Priest. It is also known by the name of Porfina, and Porphyria, sometime a suffragane Bishops seat. Returning again from the Sea-coast towards Tiberias, by the banks of Chifon, there are found the city of Hapharaim, or Abraham, and the Castles of Mezra and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the River Chifon: a beautiful city while it stood; in the Gates whereof Christ raised from death the widows only son.

Then Seon or Shion, named Iof. 19. between the two Hills of Herman, in Isachar: beyond it standeth Endor, famous by reason of the Sorceresses that undertook to raise up the body of Samuel at the illumination of Saul.

Beyond it stands Anabarith and Kubhith, named Iof. 19. v. 19.20. Then Dabarath, as it is named, Iof. 21. 28. or Dabrath, as it is named, 1 Chron. 6.71. This city (which stretcheth itself over Chifon) was a city of refuge belonging to the Levites.

Next to Dabarath is Abela situate, near the Caves of those two Theeves which so greatly molested Galilee in Herods time: It joyneth on one side to the Mountain of Isachar, or Herman, and on the other to the Valley of Isachar; which Valley continueth itself from Bethsan, or Scythopolis, the East border of Isachar, even to the Mediterran Sea: two parts whereof are inclosed by the Mountains of Gilboe on the South, and by Herman on the North. In these * Plains Gideon overthrowed the Midianites, and herein, they think, Saul fought against the Philistims, Achab against the Syrians, and the Tartars against the Sarcenis.

§. VII.

THE HALF OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

§. I.

Of the bounds of this half Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Thersa, and others.

The next Tribe which joyneth itself to Isachar towards the South, is the half of Manasse, on the West side of Jordan. Manasse was the first begotten of Joseph, the eleventh son of Jacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Putiphar Priest and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manasse, with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Jacob, were by adoption numbered amongst the sons of Jacob, and made up the number of the twelve Patriarchs.

Of Manasse there were increased in Egypt, as they were numbered at Mount Sinai, 32200. able men: all which being consumed in the Deserts, there entered of their issues, 52700.

52700. bearing arms. The Territory which fell on this one half of Manasse, was bounded by Jordan on the East, and Dora upon the Mediterran Sea on the West, Isachar on the North, and Machmata is the South border.

The first and principal City which stood in this Territory was Bethsan, sometime Nysa, faith Pliny, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same name, which Solinus confirms. Afterward when the Scythians invaded Asia the less, and pierced into the South, to the uttermost of Celestria, they built this City a-new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the City of Scythians, given by the Greeks.

These barbarous Northern people constrained the Jews to fight against their own Nation and kinned, by whose hands when they had obtained victory, they themselves set on the Jew which served them, and slew them all. Stephanus makes it the utmost towards the South of Celestria: and Strabo joyns it to Galilee. It is seated between Jordan and the Hills of Gilboe, in anone ad montes acrabitene, faith Zeigler. But I find it in the East part of the Valley of Isachar near Jordan: after that Jordan strengtheneth itself again into a River, leaving the Sea, or Lake Genezareth. Notwithstanding Montanus describes it far to the West, and towards the Mediterran Sea, near Endor, contrary to stella, Laifan, Adrichome, and all other the best Authors. This City was the greatest of all those of Decapolis: but the children of Manasse could not expel the Inhabitants thereof: and therefore called it Sane, an enemy, or Beth-san, the house of an enemy.

Over the walls of this Beth-san the Philistims hung the body of Saul, and his sons slain at Gilboe. It had, while the Christian religion flourished in those parts, an Archbishop, who had nine other Bishops of his Diocese, numbered by Tyrrins, in his 14. Book and 12. Chapter: but the same was afterward translated to Nazareth. The later travellers in those parts affirm, that there is daily taken out among the rubble and the ruins of that City, goodly pillars, and other pieces of excellent Marble, which witness the stately buildings, and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poor and desolate Village.

From Beth-san keeping the way by Jordan, they find an ancient City called Salem, which City the ancient Rabbines, faith Hierome, do not find to be the same with Hierusalem: there being in the time of Hierome and since, a town of that name, near Scythopolis before remembered, which if the place of Scripture, Gen. 13. 18. do not confirm, where the Vulgar readeth transiitque in Salem urbem Sichemorum (for which others read venit incolam in Civitatem Sechemum, making the word shalem not to be a proper name, but an adjective) yet the place John 3. 13. where it is said, that John was baptizing in Enon near Salem, may somewhat strengthen this opinion, and yet it is not unlikely that this Salem of which S. John speaketh, is but contracted of Shabalin, of which in the Tribe of Benjamin, 1 Sam. 9.4. This word Junius maketh to be the plural of Shubal: of which we read, 1 Sam. 13.17. for as for that which is added out of Canticus 6.12. of Shalamitis, as if it had been as much as a Woman of this Salem near Enon, it hath no probability.

Not far from thence where they place This City Salem, they find Bezeck the City of Adonibezec, Josephus calls it Bala: here it was that Saul assembled the strength of Israel and Juda, to the number of 330000. when he meant to relieve Jabesh Gilead, against Nasib Joseph. ant. 6. c. 5. 1 Sam. c. 11 Ammonite: who would give them no other conditions of peace, than to suffer their right eyes to be thrust out. Near Bezeck is the City of Beithera, or rather Beth-bara, of which Judg. 7.24 in the story of Gideon: and then Ephra, or Hophra, wherein Gideon inhabited: in the border whereof stood an Altar consecrated to Baal, which he pulled down and defaced; and near it that stone, on which Abimelech the Bastard slew his 70. brothers; a Heathenish cruelty, practised by the Turk to this day: and not far hence, between the Village of Asphon and Jordan, Ptolomæus Latenus overthrowed Alexander Joseph. 1. 13. c. 2. ant. King of the Jews, and slaughtered, as Josephus numbereth them, 3000. but according to Timagenes 50000. after which victory, as Ptolomæus past by the Villages of the Jews, he slew all their women, and caused the young children to be sod in great Caldrons, that the rest of the Jews might thereby think that the Egyptians were grown to be men-eaters, and strike them with the greater terror.

Towards the West and on the border of * This City Isachar, they place the Cities of * Anep of the Levites, and Abel-Mehola, which Junius, Judg. 7.22 placeth in Ephraim: it was the habitation of Heliens the Prophet, numbered with 1400. among those places, 1 Reg. 4.12 which were given in charge to Baan by Solomon, to which Iof. 1. 15. whose charge also Tabanac belonged, a place of great strength, which at the first resisted names it Josia, though their King was afterward hanged, and their City given to the Levites, derive of the Cont. Gen. 14.13. Iof. 12.17

disertan Sea; were three great Cities, to wit, Therfa, whose King was one of those that Josua slew: which the Kings of Israel used for their Regal seat, till such time as Samaria was built. From hence the wife of Jeroboam went to Asbia to enquire of her sons health: who knowing her, though she were disguised, told her of her sons death.

The second was Thebes near Samaria, of which name there are both in Egypt and Greece, of great fame: in the assault of the Tower of this Town, whereinto the Citizens retired, the Bastard Abimelec was wounded by a weighty stone, thrown by a woman over the wall, who despairing of his recovery, commanded his Page to slay him outright, because it should not be said that he perished by the stroke of a woman. But others set this City in Ephraim near Siechem, or Neapolis.

The third is Acrabata, of which the Territory adjoining is called Acrabatena, (one of the ten Toparchies, or governments in Judea) for which Hierome, 1 Mac. 5. reads Arabatena: but in the Greek it is Acrabatine: Isidore calls it Agrabat. This City had one of the largest Territories of all Palestine belonging to the Governour thereof. Josephus remembreth it often, as in his second book of the Jews wars, c. 11. 25, 28, and elsewhere.

The difference between a Tetrarchy and a Toparchy, was, that the first was taken for a Province, and the other for a City with some lesser Territory adjoining; and a Tetrarchy is the same with Preses in Latine, and President in English, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdom; and thereof so called. Pliny nameth seventeen Tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had four, and so hath the Kingdom of Ireland to this day, Leinster, Ulster, Connath, and Munster.

To the South-west of Acrabata they place the Cities of Balaam, or Bilham, and Gethremmon of the Levites: but Junius out of Jos. 21. 25. and 1 Chron. 6. 70. gathers that these two are but one; and that Jibleham, Jos. 16. 11. is another name of the same City.

Then is Jezael a Regal City, set at the foot of the Mountains of Gilboa, towards the South-west: herein Jezabel, by a false accusation, caused Naboth to be stoned, to the end she might possess his Vineyard adjoining to the City, which Naboth refused to sell, because it was his inheritance from his father.

Joram also was cast unbudied into the same field: for which his mother Jezabel murdered Naboth.

Toward the Sea from Jezael is the City which they call Gaber: in whose ascent as Abasabiel King of Juda fled from Jehoi, when he had slain Joram, he was wounded with the shot of an arrow, of which wound he died at Mageddo adjoining. The Scripture calls this City of Gaber, Gur.

Then Adadremmon, near unto which the good King Josias was slain by Necho King of Egypt, in a war unadvisedly undertaken. For Necho marched towards Affrya against the King thereof, by the commandment of God, whom Josias thought to resist in his passage. It was afterward called Maximianopolis.

A neighbour City to Adadremmon was Mageddo, often remembered in the Scriptures: whose King was slain among the rest by Josias: yet they defended their City for a long time against Manasse. The River which passeth by the Town, may perhaps be the same which Ptolomy calleth Chorfeus: and not that of which we have spoken in Babylon. For because this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that have described the Holy Land, delineate no such River. Moore only sets it down in his Geography of the twelve Tribes; but the River which passeth by Mageddo, he therinto standeth to be but a branch, falling thereinto. Laifan and Schoa make a great confluence of waters in this place, agreeable to this Scripture in the fifth of Judges: Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tanaac by the waters of Mageddo. But these Authors, and with them Stella, give it no other name than the Torrent so called.

But seeing that ancient Geographers stretch out the bounds of Phenicia even to Sebaste, or Samaria; and Strabo far beyond it, on the Sea-coast: And Josephus calls Cesaria Palestina, a City of Phenicia; yea, Laurentius seeing also Ptolomy sets down Judeus for the partition of Phenicia and Judea, this river running East and West parallel with Samaria: it is very probable that this Torrent called Mageddo, after the name of the City which it watereth, is the same which Ptolomy in his fourth Table of Asia, calleth Chorfeus. The later travellers of the Holy Land call Mageddo Subimbre at this day.

II.

Of Cesaria Palestine, and some other Towns.

From Mageddo toward the West, and near the Mediterranean Sea, was that glorious City of Cesaria Palestine: first, the Tower of Straton: the same which Pliny calls Apollonia: though Ptolomy sets Apollonia elsewhere, and toward Egypt, between this City and Joppe, to which Vespasian gave the name of Flavia

Flavia Colonia. It was by Herod re-built, who therein laboured to exceed all the works in that part of the world. For besides the edifices, which he reared within the Walls, of cut and polish'd marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might look over the Seas far away, with the high and stately Towers and Gates: he forced a Harborow of great capacity, being in former times but an open Bay: and the wind blowing from the Sea, the Merchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their Cables and Anchors. This work he performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that hath not been found in any Kingdom, nor in any age: which, because the Materials were fetched from far, and the weight of the stones was such, as it exceeded belief; I have added Josephus own words of this work, which are these: Hanc locorum *in commoditatem correcturus, cerculum portus circumduxit, quantum putaret magne classis recipiende sufficere: & in viginti ulnarum profundum, prae grandia saxa demisit: quorum pleraque pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis vero octodecim, altitudine novempedali: fuerunt quaedam etiam majora, minoralia: To mend this inconvenience of place (saith Josephus) he compass in a Bay where in a great Fleet might well ride: and let down great stones twenty fadome deep: whereof some were fifty foot long, eighteen foot broad, and nine foot thick: and some bigger, some lesser. To this he added an arm or cawlie of two hundred foot long, to break the waves: the rest he strengthened with a stone wall, with divers stately Towers thereon builded: of which the most magnificent he called Drusus, after the name of Drusus the son in law of Cesar: in whose honour he intituled the City it self, Cesaria of Palestine: all which he performed in twelve years time. It was the first of the Eastern Cities that received a Bishop: afterward erected into an Archbishoprick, commanding twenty others under it, saith*

Thyrinus.

S. Hierome nameth Theophilus, Eusebius, Acacius, Enzorus, and Galasius, to have been Bishops thereof. In this City was Cornelius the Centurion baptised by Saint Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle. S. Paul was herein two years prisoner, under the President Felix, unto the time and government of Porcius Festus: by whom making his appeal, he was sent to Cesar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the Quinquennalia, taking delight to be called a god by his flatterers, he was stricken with an Angel unto death, saith Josephus.

To the North of Cesaria standeth Dora, or Napboth Dor, as some read, Jos. 1. 2. so called (saith Adrichomius) because it joyneth to the Sea, whose King was slain by Josua. But Junius, for in Napboth Dor, reads in tradiabus Dor: and so the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor, although 1 Reg. 4. 11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Napboth Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Josua call it Nephtib-Dor, and in the other of the Kings, Nepha-Dor: but the true name by other places (as Jos. 12. 23. Judg. 1. 27.) may seem to be Dor. It was a strong and powerful City, and the fourth in account of those twelve Principalities, or Sitarchies, which Solomon erected. Junius upon Macc. 15. 11. placeth this between the Hill Carmel, and the mouth of the river Cherfeus: for so some name the river Chorfeus, of which we have spoken already.

Into this City, for the strength thereof, Tryphon fled from Antiochus the son of Demetrius: where he was by the same Antiochus, besieged with 12000. foot-men, and 8000. horse: the same perfidious villain that received 200. talents for the ransom of Jonathan Macchabeus (whom he had taken by treachery) and then slew him: and after him slew his own Master, usurping for a while the Kingdom of Syria. It had also a Bishops seat of the Diocess of Cesaria.

From Cesaria towards the South, they place the Cities of Caphernaum, Gabe, and Galgal: for besides that Capharnaum famous in the Evangelists, they find in these parts near the West Sea, another of the same name. Of Gabe, Hierome in locis Hebraicis. The famous Galgal, or Gilgal, was in Benjamin: but this Gilgal, they say, it was whose King was slain by Josua.

Then Antipatris, so called of Herod, in honour of his Father: but in the time of the Macchabees, it was called Capharsalama: in the fields whereof Judas Macchabeus overthrew a part of the Army of Nicanor, Lieutenant to Demetrius: an Army drawn into Judea by a traitorous Jew, called Aleimus: who contended for the Priest-hood, first under Bacchides, and then under Nicanor. To this was Saint Paul carried prisoner from Hierusalem, conducted by 470. fouldiers, to defend him from the fury of the Jews. In after-times the Army of Godfrey of Bullion attempted it in vain: yet was it taken by Baldwine. It was honoured in those days with a Bishops seat, but it is now a poor Village, called Ajzur, saith Brecheard. Near unto this City the Prophet Jonas was three days preserved in the body of a Whale.

Into the Land, from Antipatris and Cesaria

ria, Randeth Narbata, whereof the Territory taketh name: which Cestius the Roman was fled with fire and sword: because the Jews which dwelt at Casaria fled thence, and carried with them the Books of Moses. Near unto it is the Mountain of Abdia, the Steward of King Achab: wherein he hid an hundred Prophets, and fed them: after which he himself is said to have obtained from God the Spirit of Prophecy also.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdom of Phœnicia.

S. I.

The bounds and chief Cities, and Founders, and Name of this Kingdom: and of the invention of Letters ascribed to them.

BECAUSE these five Tribes, of Asser, Neftalim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the half of Manasse, possess the better part of that ancient Kingdom of Phœnicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus; I have therefore gathered a brief of those Kings which have governed therein: at least so many of them as time (which devourer all things) hath left to posterity: and that the rest perished, it is not strange: seeing so many Volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and revolution, and in so many changes of Estates, and Conquest of Heathen Princes have been torn, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this Kingdom, as touching the South parts, are very uncertain: but all Cosmographers do in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Cassotis, ends: most of them bounding it by Orithesia, to the North of Tripolis. Platony makes it a little larger, as reaching from the River Eleutherus: that falls into the Sea at the Island of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orithesia, and stretching from thence along the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, as far as the River of Chorfeus: which seems to be that which the Jews call the Torrent, or River of Maggeddo. Pliny extends it further, and comprehends Joppe within it: Corvinus and Budaus, Joppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud priscos appellata (saith Budaus) que nunc Palestina Syria dicitur: It was called Phœnicia of old (saith he) which now is called Palestina of Syria.

Strabo comprehends in this Country of Phœnicia all the Sea-side of Judea, and Palestina, even unto Pelusiuz, the first Port of Egypt. On the contrary, Diodorus Siculus foldeth it up in Cœlogria, which he boundeth not. But for my self, I take a middle course, and like best of Platonius description, who was seldom deceived in his own art. It had in it these famous Maritime Cities (besides all those of the Islands) to wit, Aradus, Orithesia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblos, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Pholomais (or Accon) Dora, and Casaria Palestine: and by reason of the many Ports and goodly Sea-towns, it anciently commanded the Trades of the Eastern world: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterranean Sea.

The ancient Regal Seat of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first son of Canaan: and the people then subject to that people were called Zidonians; the same state continuing even unto Joshua's time. For till then, it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region; afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Book of Vandals wars. But in process of time the City of Tyre adjoining, became the more magnificent: yet, according to the Prophet, it was but a daughter of Zidon, and by them first built, and peopled.

But after the death of Moses, and while Joshua yet governed Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, came thence with his sons Cadmus, Phœnix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cadrenus and Curtius) and built and possessed the Cities of Tyre and Zidon: to wit the new Tyrrus, and brought into Phœnicia (so called after the name of his second son) the use of Letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuit after his sister Europa, taught the Grecians. For Taurus King of Crete, when he surprised Tyre, had stola her thence: of which the Poets devised the fable of Jupiter's transformation into a Bull, by whom that health was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the first King of Phœnicia; and finds Cadmus his Successor, whom he calleth his grand-child: and it seemeth that Belus was the father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the successors of Dido held that name always in reverence, making it a part of their own, as Asdrubal, Hannibal: whose memory Virgil also toucheth in these Verses.

*Hic Regina gravem gemmâ aureoque poposcit, Implevitq; mero pateram: quam Belus & omnes
A Belo soliti.*

The Queen anon commands the weighty bowl

(Weighty with precious stones and massive gold)

To flow with wine. This Belus us'd of old,
And all of Belus Line.

Whether this Belus were father or grandfather to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seems to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancestor to these Phœnicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Jupiter Belus, the son of Neptune by Lybia the daughter of Epaphus, or were he the son of Thelegonus, according to Ensebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops time, saith Saint Augustine, Moses left Egypt: Agenors successor living at once with Joshua. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither do I deny, but that he gave that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his son. But instead of the building of Tyre and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a Founder, as Semiramis and Nebuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For be it true, that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought up in Egypt: where he learnt the use of Letters (Egypt flourished in all kind of learning in Moses time) or were he by Nation an Egyptian, yet it is very likely that either he came to have his own Territory, or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan from the Israelites: who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great loss and dishonour of that Nation: and by Joshua conducted over Jordan, to conquer and possess the Canaanite Land. For though the Egyptians, by reason of the loss which they received by the hand of God in the Red Sea, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrews from invading Canaan by land: which also they knew had so many powerful Nations to defend it: the Dejars inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Moabites, Amorites, and Ammonites their borderers: yet Egypt having such Vessels or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in use, did not in all probability neglect to garrison the Sea-coast, or assist Agenor with such forces as they had to spare; and which they might perform with the greater facility, in that the Philistines, which held the shores of Canaan next adjoining unto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now, as it appeareth by the course of the story, those Cities of Phœnicia, which Agenor was said to have built (that is, to have fortified and defended against Joshua, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Joshua called the strong City Accho, afterward Pholomais, Achzib, and Dor.) were all that Phœnicia had in those daies.

That the Kings of Phœnicia were mighty, especially by Sea, it appears, first by their defence against Israel: secondly, by this, that David and Solomon could not master them, but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it full 13. years against a King of Kings, Nebuchodonosor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the providence of God, seemed unresistible) spent more time in the recovery of Tyre, than in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Josephus, who conceives that Tyre was founded by Tyrrus the son of Japhet. And for the Region it self, though Calisthenes derive it, ab arbore dactylorum; and the Greeks from the word Phonox, of laughter, because the Phœnicians slew all that came on their coasts; yet for my self, I take it that Phœnicia the son of Agenor gave it that name. But that either Agenor in Phœnicia, or Cadmus his son in Greece, were the Inventors of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute unnecessary.

The Ethiopi affirm, that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linnus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences, and civil Policies, which they afterwards profest, and taught others: and that Pythagoras himself was instructed by the Lybians: to wit, from the South and superiour Egyptians: from whom those which inhabited neerer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Divinity and Philosophy: and from them the Greeks, then barbarous, received Civility. Again, the Phœnicians challenge this invention of Letters and of Learning: acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither do they allow that Agenor and his sons were Africans; whence Lucan, Phœnicians first (if ſame may credit have)

In rude Characters dar'd our words to grave.

And that Cadmus was the ſon of Agenor, was a Phœnician and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that answer made by Zeno; when he in a kind of reproach was called a Stranger, and not a Phœnician.

Alben. l. 1. Si patria eſt Phœnix quid tuus eſt nam Cadmus

If a Phœnician born I am, what then?
Cadmus was ſo: to whom Græce owes
The Books of learned men.

Joſeph. contra. Ap. phœn. Out of doubt the Phœnicians were very ancient: and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Joſephus the Hiſtorian confirms a great part of his Antiquities. The Thracians again ſubſcribe to none of theſe reports: but affirm conſtantly, that the great Zambes flouriſhed among them: when Atlas lived in Mauritania: Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt: and Ochus in Phœnicia. Yea, ſome of the French do not bluſh to maintain, that the ancient Gauls taught the Greeks the uſe of Letters and other Sciences. And do not we know that our Bardes and Druides are as ancient as thoſe Gauls, and that they ſent their ſons hither to be by them inſtructed in all kind of learning?

Laſtly, whereas others beſtow this invention on Japhes, the ſame hath no probability at all; for he lived at ſuch time as Learning and Arts flouriſhed moſt, both in Egypt and Aſſyria, and he himſelf was brought up in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancy.

But true it is, that Letters were invented by thoſe excellent Spirits of the firſt age, and before the general Flood: either by Seth or Enos, or by whom eſſe God knows: from whom all wiſdom and underſtanding hath proceeded. And as the ſame infinite God is preſent with all his Creatures, ſo hath he given the ſame invention to divers Nations: whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other; as well in this as in many other knowledges: for even in Mexico, when it was firſt diſcovered, there was found written Books after the manner of thoſe Hieroglyphicks, anciently uſed by the Egyptians, and other Nations: and ſo had theſe Americans a kind of Heraldry; and their Princes differing in Arms and ſentences, like unto thoſe uſed by the Kings and Nobility of other Nations, Jura naturalia communia, & generalia &c. Natural laws are common, and general.

II. Of the Kings of Tyre.

BUT whatſoever remaineth of the Story Band Kings of Phœnicia (the books of Zeno, Sachoniathe, Minæas, and others of that Nation; being no where found) the ſame is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Joſephus, and Theophilus Antiocenus.

Agenor lived at once with Joſaph, to whom ſucceeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and ſo far towards the North as Aradus, took the name of Phœnicia: what King ſucceeded Phœnix it doth not appear; but at ſuch time as the Grecians beſieged Tro, Phœni governed Phœnicia.

In Hieronymus time, and while Jehoaſaph ruled in Juda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieronymus ſpeaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of ſeveral Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Army wherewith he invaded Greece, Tetramneſtus ruled that part of Phœnicia about Tyre and Zidon: who commanded, as ſome Writers affirm, Xerxes Fleet, or rather, as I ſuppoſe, thoſe 300 Gallies, which himſelf brought to his aid: for at this time it ſeemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Ragui, and petty Kings in Hieronymus time, they were ſubjected by Nabuchodonosor; of whoſe conqueſts in the Chapter before remembered, Hieremie propheteſt.

Tenmer, though not immediately, ſucceeded Tetramneſtus, remembered by D. Siculus in his 14. Book.

Strato, his ſucceſſor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, becauſe of his dependency upon Darius, and that his Predeceſſors had ſerved the Eaſt Empire againſt the Grecians. But divers Kings, of whom there is no memory, came between Tenmer and Strato. For there were conſumed 130. years and ſomewhat more, between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander eſteemed the more unworthy of of reſtitution, becauſe (ſaith Curtius) he rather ſubmitted himſelf by the intigation of his ſubjects (who foreſaw their utter ruine by reſiſtance) than that he had any diſpoſition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Alben. l. 1. Of this Strato, Albenus out of Theopompus reporteth; that he was a man of ill living, and moſt voluptuous; alſo that he appointed certain games and prizes for women-dancers, and ſingers, whom he to this end chiefly invited, and aſſembled: that having beheld the moſt beautiful and lively among them, he might recover them for his own uſe and delights. Of the ſtrange accident about the death of one Strato King of theſe coaſts,

S. Hierome and others make mention: who having heard that the Persians were near him with an Army too weighty for his ſtrength, and finding that he was to hope for little grace, becauſe of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians, he determining to kill himſelf, but fainting in the execution, his wife being preſent, wreſted the Sword out of his hand, and ſlew him: which done, he alſo therewith pierced her own body, and died.

After Alexander was poſſeſſed of Zidon, and the other Strato driven thence, he gave the Kingdom to Hephæſion to diſpoſe of: who having received great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whoſe houſe he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith: and willingly offered to eſtabliſh him therein: but this Citizen, no leſs virtuous than rich, deſired Hephæſion that this honour might be conferred on ſome one of the blood and race of their ancient Kings: and preſented unto him Balonimus, whom Curtius calls Abdolominus, Japhne, Abdolominus, and Plutarch, Alynomus: who at the very hour that he was called to this regal Eſtate, was with his own hands working in his Garden, ſetting herbs and roots, for his relief and ſuſtenance: though otherwiſe a wiſe man, and exceeding juſt.

Theſe were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whole eſtate being afterwards changed into Popular or Ariſtoeratical: and by times and turns ſubjected to the Emperours of the Eaſt, there remaineth no further memory of them, than that which is formerly delivered in the Tribe of Aſſer.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appear: Joſephus the Hiſtorian, as is ſaid, had many things wherewith he garbiſhed his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Joſephus and Theophilus Antiocenus, there may be gathered a deſcent of ſome twenty Kings of the Tyrians; but theſe Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Alexander Labeſus, do in no fort agree in the times of their reigns, nor in other particulars.

Abibalus is the firſt King of the Tyrians, that Joſephus and Theophilus remember, whom Theophilus calls Abemalus: the ſame per chance that the ſon of Sirach mentioneth in his forty and ſixth Chapter, ſpeaking of the Princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibalus, Suron ſucceeded, if he be not one and the ſame with Abibalus. David (ſaith Eufebius out of Eupolemus) conſtrained this Suron to pay him Trib: to, of whom alſo David complaineth, Pal. 83.

Hiram ſucceeded Suron, whom Joſephus calls Irom, and Theophilus ſometime Hieronymus, ſometimes Hieromus, but Tatian and Zonaras, Chiram. He entred into a league with David, and ſent him Cedars, with Maſons and Carpenters, to perform his buildings in Jeruſalem, after he had beaten thence the Jebusiſes. The ſame was he that ſo greatly aſſiſted Solomon: whom he not only furniſhed with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raiſing of the Temple, and with great ſums of money, but alſo he joyned with him in his enterprize of the Eaſt India, and of Opbir: and furniſhed Solomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the moſt excellent Navigators: and lent him 120 talents of gold. Of this Hiram there is not only mention in divers places of Scripture, but in Joſephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8. Chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his third book, in Tatianus his Oration againſt the Greeks: and in Zonaras, Tome the firſt. This Prince ſeemeth to be very mighty and magnificent, he deſpised the 20. Towns which Solomon offered him: he defended himſelf againſt that victorious King David: and gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon, called the Zidonian: for whole ſake he was contented to worſhip Aſtaroth, the Idol of the Phœnicians. Hiram lived 53. years.

Baleſartus, whom Theophilus Antiochennus calleth Bazorus, ſucceeded Hiram King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7. years, according to Joſephus.

Abdaſartus the eldeſt ſon of Baleſartus, governed 9. years, and lived but 20. years, according to Joſephus: but after Theophilus he reigned 12. years, and lived 54. who being ſlain by the four ſons of his own Nurſe, the eldeſt of them held the Kingdom 12. years.

Aſartus brother to Abdaſartus, recovered the Kingdom from this Uſurper, and reigned 12. years.

Aſarimus, or Aſharimus, after Theophilus, a Joſeph. 54. Theoph. 58. third third brother, followed Astartus, and ruled 9. years, and lived in all 54.

Thobalus (or Juthobalus, in Theophilus) son to the third brother Astartus, who was the chief Priest of the Goddess Astarta, which was a dignity next unto the King, revenged the death of his father, and slaughtered his Uncle Phelles: and reigned 32. years; the same which in the first of Kings, chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose daughter Jezabel Achab married.

Badezor, or Bazor, the son of Thobalus, or Ethbaal, brother to Jezabel, succeeded his Father, and reigned 6: years, and lived in all 45.

Mettimus succeeded Badezor, and reigned but 9. years (saith Josephus) he had two sons, Pygmalion and Barca, and two daughters, Elisa and Anna.

Pygmalion reigned after Mettimus his Father 40. years, and lived 56. In the seventh year of whose reign, Elisa sailed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143. years and 8. months after the Temple of Solomon: which by our account was 289. years after Troy was taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Æneas and Dido must be far out of square. For Pygmalion, covetous of Sichem his riches, who had married his sister Elisa, flew him traitorously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we believe

Justine and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Elisa fearing to be dispoiled of her husband's treasure, fled by Sea into Africa, as aforesaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his mothers tears, and by threats from the Oracle arrested. Barca, accompanied his sister, and assisted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Family of the Barca in Africa, of which race descended many famous Captains, and the great Hannibal. Servius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her man-like acts: others from Jedidia, a surname of Solomon.

Elulcus succeeded Pygmalion, and reigned 36. years: the same that overthrew the Fleet of Salmanasser, in the Port of Tyre: notwithstanding which he continued his siege before it on the Land side five years, but in vain.

After Elulcus, Ethobales governed the Tyrians, who vaunted himself to be as wise as Daniel: and that he knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his 28. Chapter: out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince died, or was slain in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor, who surrounded and attempted Tyre 13: years together, ere he prevailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10. years a tributary, perchance, to Nabuchodonosor: for after his death, it was governed by divers Judges, succeeding each other: First by Enjibalus, then by Chelbis, Alarus the Priest, Mittimus, and Gerastus, who held it among them some 7. years, and odd months: after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a King for one year: after him Asterbalus sent from Babylon, 4. years: after him Irom, sent thence also, 29. years. In the 17. of whose reign Cyrus began to govern Persia.

§. III.

Of Bozrus his conceits, that the Edumians inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phœnicia the knowledge of the true God.

OF the great mutations of this Kingdom and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of divers other Nations, there is one Bozrus that hath written a Treatise at large, intituled, De ruinis Gentium. And although the great and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea, in all things under heaven, have proceeded from his ordinance, who onely is unchangeable, and the same for ever; yet whereas the said Bozrus, enforcing here-hence, that the prosperity and ruine of the Tyrians were fruits of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion: to prove this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to have been Edumians, descended from Ejan, Jacobs brother: first, it can hardly be believed, that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glory, was in any sort truly devout and religious. But to this end (besides the proof which the Scriptures give of Hiram's good affection when Solomon built the Temple) he brings many conjectural arguments; whereof the strongest is their pedigree and descent: it being likely in his opinion, that the posterity of Ejan received from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edumians, he endeavours to shew, partly by weak reasons, painfully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than weight: partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Pliny, and others, witness, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Islands, called

Tyris,

Tyris, Aradus, and Sidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards given to the Cities of Phœnicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) under the Edumians: as Elah and Esongabar, or under the Amalekites, who descended of Amalec the Nephew of Ejan, whose chief City was Madian, so called of Madian the son of Abraham by Cethura, whose posterity did people it: the consequence appears good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edumites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Israel. Hereunto he adds, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Astarte, the Idol of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pheracydes being Phœnicians, themselves differed much in their Philosophy from the Idolatrous customs of the Greeks. That in Teman, a Town of the Edumians, was an University, wherein, as may appear by Eliphas the Temanite, who disputed with Job, Religion was sincerely taught.

Such is the discourse of Bozrus, who labouring to prove one Paradox by another, deserves in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumians, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his people: neither is it true that they were Edumians at all. In what Religion Ejan brought up his children, it is no where found written; but that himself was a profane man, and disavowed by God, the Scriptures in plain terms express. That his Posterity were Idolaters, is directly proved in the 25. Chapter of the second Book of Chronicles. That the Edumites were perpetual enemies to the house of Israel, save only when David and some of his race, Kings of Juda, held them in subjection, who knows not? or who is ignorant of David's unfriendly behaviour amongst them, when first they were subdued? surely, it was not any argument of Kinred or Alliance between Tyris and Mount Seir, that Hiram had such good correspondence with David; even then when Joab slew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their devotion to God, and good affection to Israel, that the Edumites were so ill treated. It seemeth that the piety and ancient wisdom of Eliphas the Temanite was then forgotten, and the Edumians punished, for being such as David in his own days found them. Although indeed the City of Teman whence Eliphas came to reason with Job, is not that in Edumæa, but another of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Galilee, and adjoining to Hus, the country of Job: and to Sueb the City of Bildad the Subite; as both such Chorographers who best knew those parts, do plainly shew, and the holy Text maketh manifest. For Job is said to have exceeded in riches, and Solomon in wisdom; all the people of the East; nor the Inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Palestina. True it is, that Eliphas the son of Ejan had a son called Teman: but that fathers were wont in those dayes to take name of their sons, I no where find. And that the Tyrians originally were Edumites: it is not unlike, that Teman in the East had the name: for as much as in the 7. Chapter of the Book of Judges, the Asidianites, Amalekites, and all they of the East are called Ismaelites. And he that well considers how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst give battel to the Host of Israel, wherein were 600000. able men, will hardly believe that such a people were descended from one of Ejan his grand-children. For how powerful and numberless must the forces of all Edom have been: if one Tribe of them, yea, one Family of a Tribe had been so great? surely Mount Seir and all the Regions adjoining could not have held them. But we no where find that Edom had to do with Amalec, or assisted the Amalekites, when Saul went to root them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it self, if distinct from the Ismaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being son to Abraham by Cethura, doubtless was no Edomite. And thus much in general for all the Signiory of the Red Sea coast, which Bozrus imagines the Edumians to have held: if the Edumites in after-times held some places, as Ejan and Esongabar on the Red Sea shore, yet in Moses' time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moses himself saith, that Israel did compass all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian stood, Moses must needs have known it: because he had sojourned long in that Country: and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Egypt.

But conjectural Arguments, how probable soever, are needless in so manifest a case. For in the 83. Psalm, Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sydonians being one people, as all good Authors then, and Bozrus himself con-fesse, were Canaanites, as appears, Gen. 10. 15. and 19. appointed by God to have been destroyed, and their Lands given to the children of Israhel. Jos. 29. because they were Idolaters, and of the cursed seed of Canaan, not not Cousins to Israel, nor professors of the same Religion. For though Hiram said, Blessed be God that hath sent King David a wife unto us: we cannot infer that he was of David's Religion. The Turk hath said as much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certain it is, that the Sydonians then worshipped Ashtaroth; and drew Solomon also to the same Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram aided Solomon in building the Temple, he did it for his own ends, receiving therefore of Solomon great provision of Corn and Oyl, and the offer of twenty Towns and Villages in Galilee. And if we rightly consider things, it will appear that Hiram in all points dealt Merchant-like with Solomon. He allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is over pestered, being otherwise apt to yield silks: as the Andarine Silks which come from thence, and other good Commodities. For Corn and Oyl, which he wanted, he gave that which he could well spare to Solomon. Also Gold for Land: wherein Solomon was the wiser; who having got the Gold first, gave to Hiram the worst Villages that he had: with which the Tyrian was ill pleased. But it was a necessary policy which enforced Tyru to hold league with Israel. For David had subdued Mobab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia; even to Euphrates: thorow which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carry and re-carry their Wares on Camels, to their Fleets on the Red Sea, and back again to Tyru: so that Solomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to pass, could have cut off their Trade.

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Solomon, as Lord of the Sea-towns which his Father had taken from the Philistines, might have greatly distressed the Tyrians; and perhaps have brought them even into subjection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no marvel) that Solomon rather meant, as a man of peace, to employ his Fathers Treasure in magnificent Works, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly aided him, and sent him cunning workmen, to increase his delight in goodly Buildings, Imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages between Solomon and Hiram, are no strong arguments of piety in the Tyrians: so those other proofs which Bozias frames negatively upon particular examples are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I think, no man knows. It seems to me, that having more cunning than the Greeks, and being very ambitious, he would fain have purchased divine honours; which his Daughters, Nephews, and others of his house obtained; but his own many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pythagoras are but single examples: Every salvage Nation hath some wisdom excellet the Vulgar, even of civil people. Neither did the moral wisdom of these men express any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not known to have taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Utica, Leptis, Cadix, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which I think, the Islands before mentioned in the Red Sea to have been, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, even from their first beginnings: therefore the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry from Solomon's time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozias, who would have us think them to have been formerly a strange kind of devout Edomites. In which fancy he is so peremptory, that he stileth men of contrary opinion, Impiopoliticos; as if it were impiety to think, that God (who even among the Heathen, which have not known his Name, doth favour Virtue and hate Vice), hath often rewarded moral honesty, with temporal happiness. Doubtless, this doctrine of Bozias would better have agreed with Julian the Apostate, than with Cyril. For if the Affrians, Greeks, Romans, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew nearest unto the true Religion: what may be said of the foul Idolatry which grew in Rome as fast as Rome it self grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost upon every new victory? How few great battels did the Romans win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new god, or some new honour to one of their old gods? yea, what one Nation, save only that of the Jews, was subdued by them, whose Gods they did not afterward entertain in their City? Only the true God, which was the God of the Jews, they rejected, upbraiding the Jews with him, as if he were unworthy of the Roman Majesty: shall we hereupon enforce the lewd and foolish conclusion which Heathen Writers used against the Christians in the Primitive Church: That such Idolatry had caused the City of

Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperity were a sign or effect of true Religion. Such is the blind zeal of Bozias, who writing against those whom he fallily terms impious, gives strength to such as are impious indeed. But such indiscretion is usually found among men of his humour; who having once either foolishly embraced the dreams of others, or vainly fashioned in their own brains any strange Chimera's of Divinity, condemn all such in the pride of their zeal, as Atheists and Infidels, that are not transported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pity it is, that such mad dogs are oftentimes encouraged by those, who having the command of many tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim.

§. I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

HAVING now past over Phenicia, we come to the next Territory adjoining, which is that of Ephraim: sometimes taken per excellentiam, for the whole Kingdom of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second son of Joseph, whose issues when they left Egypt were in number 45000, all which dying in the Deserts, (Joshua excepted) there entered the Holy Land of their children grown to be able men, 32500, who fate down on the West side of Jordan; between Manasse and Benjamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Jordan, and the Mediterran Sea, did by the East and West.

The first and chief City which Ephraim had, was Samaria, the Metropolis of the Kingdom of Israel, built by Amri or Homri King thereof, and seated on the top of the Mountain Somron, which overlooketh all the bottom, and as far as the Sea-coast. It was afterward called Sebasto, or Augusta, in honour of Augustus Caesar. This City is often remembered in the Scriptures; and magnificent it was in the first building; for as Brochard observeth, the ruins which yet remain, and which Brochard found greater than those of Hierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood upright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble pillars, with other hewn and carved stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the sons of Hircanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the son of Antipater: who to flatter Cesar called it Sebasto. Herein were the Prophets Heliseus and Abdias buried: and so was John Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Greecian Monks.

Near Samaria towards the South, is the hill of Bethel, and a Town of that name: on the top of which mountain Jeroboam erected one of his golden calves, to be worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this Mountain of Bethel, was Sichem, that ancient City of Sichem; after the restoration called Neapolis, now Pelosa, and Naplo-lafa: It was destroyed by Simoon and Levi, in revenge of the ravishment of their sister Dina; and after that by Abimelec evened with the soil. Jeroboam raised it up again: and the Damascens a third time call it down.

Under Sichem toward the Sea standeth Pharaton or Pirbathon, on the Mountain Amalec, the City of Abdon Judge of Israel. And under it Bethoron of the Levites, built as it is said by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim. Near to this City Judas Maccabaeus overthrew Seron and Lysias, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This City had Solomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Between Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Jos. 18. and Saron, whose King was slain by Joshua: it is also mentioned Abd. 9. 35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh 144. 10. 11.

keth name, which beginning at Cesarea Palestine, extendeth it self alongst the coast as far as Joppa, faith Adrichome: though indeed the name Saron is not particularly given to this Valley, but to every fruitful plain Region; for not onely this Valley is so called, to wit, between Cesarea and Joppa, but that also between the Mountain Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for so S. Hierome, upon the five and thirtieth Chapter of Ezay, interprets the word saron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries upon Abdia, read Saron for Affaron: understanding thereby a Plaine near Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Diopols, or the City of Jupiter, one of the Toparchies of Judaea, the fit in dignity (or the third after Pliny) where S. Peter (non sua, sed Christi virtute) cured Aeneas, Niger callsall that Region from Antilibanus to Joppa, Saron. This Joppa was burnt to the ground by the Romans, those Ravens and spoilers of all Estates, disturbers of Common-weales, usurpers of other Princes Kingdoms; who with no other respect led than to amplify their own glory, troubled the whole world: and themselves, after murdering one another, became a prey to the most and savage barbarous Nations.

In Diopols (faith Wil. of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whose honour and memory Justinian the Emperor caused a fair Church to be built over his Tombe; that be Tyrius his words: Relicta à dextris locis maritimus Antipatriæ, & Joppæ, per latè patenter plantum Elutheriam pertransientes, Liddam quæ est Diopols, ubi & egregii Martyris Georgii usque hodie sepulchrum ostenditur, pervenerunt, ejus Ecclesiam quum ad honorem ejusdem Martyris, pius & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, Augustus Justinianus multo studio & devotione prompta edificari præceperat, &c. They having left (faith he) on the right hand, the Sea Towns, Antipatris and Joppa, passing over the great open Plain of Elutheria, came to Lidda, which is Diopols: where the sumptuous Tomb of the famous Martyr S. George is at this day shewed; whose church when the godly and orthodox Prince of the Roman, High and mighty Justinian, had commanded to be built, with great earnestness and present devotion, &c. Thus far Tyrius: by whose testimony we may conjecture that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria; but rather some better Christian: for this of Alexandria was slain there in an uprore of the people, and his ashes cast into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet also it may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian than he is commonly thought: for his words of the Temple of Genius, How long shall this Sepulchre stand? occasioned the uprore of the people against him: as fearing least he would give attempt to overthrow that beautiful Temple. This also Marcellinus reports; who though he say that this Georgius was also deadly hated of the Christians, who else might have refused him: yet he addeth, that his ashes, with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the Sea, lest if their Reliques had been gathered up, Churches should be built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather think that it was not Georgius, whose name lives in the right honourable order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Tyrius abovecited witnesseth to have been buried at Lidda or Diopols. The same also is confirmed by Vitrius, S. Hierome affirms, that it was sometime called Tigrida, and while the Christians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a Bishop Suffragan.

Near to Lidda or Diopols standeth Ramatha of the Levites, or Aramathia: afterward Rama, and Ramatha, the native City of Josaph, which buried the body of Christ. There are many places which bear this name of Rama; one they set in the Tribe of Juda near Thebus in the way of Hebron; another in Nephtalim, not far from Seppet a third in Zabulon, which they say, adjoyneth to Sepphet a fourth, which they make the same with Silo; and a fifth, which is this Rama, in the hills of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel lived, and wherein he is buried.

From hence to the North alongst the coast are Holon, or Ajalon of the Levites, of which Chron. 6. Apollonia, of which Josaphus in his Antiquities, and in the wars of the Jews. Also Balsatha for which Junius, 2 Reg. 4. 42. reads planities Shalitha they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim; but Junius upon 1 Sam. 6. where we read of the Land of Shalitha, findeth it in Benjamin.

On the other side of the Mountains of Ephraim standeth Gofsa, one of the Toparchies, or Cities of government, the second in dignity, of which the Country about it taketh name.

Then Thamnath-Sarah, or according to the Hebrew, Thamnath-Serach: one also of the ten Toparchies, or Presidencies of Judaea, which they call Thamnathica, a goodly City, and strong, seated on one of the high Hills of Ephraim, upon the North of the Hill called Gams, which City and Territory Israel gave unto their Leader Josua; who also amplified it with buildings, near which he was buried. His Sepulchre remained in S. Hieroms time, and over it the Shu engraven, in memory of that that greatest of wonders which God wrought in Josua's time.

In the places adjoyning standeth Adarsa, or Adasa, where Judas Machabæus with three thousand Jews overthrew the Army of Nicanor, Lieutenant of Syria; near to Cafer, or Gezer, which Josua took, and hung their King; a City of the Levites. It was afterward taken by Pharaoh of Egypt; the people all slain, and the City razed; Solomon rebuilt it.

To the East of this place is the Frontier City of Jessui, of which Jos. 16.3. otherwise Pelethi, whence David had part of his Prætorian Souldiers, under the charge of Benaia. Then that high and famous Mountain and City of Silo, whereon the Ark of God was kept so many years, till the Philistims got it.

To this they joyn the City of Machmas, or Michmas: in which Jonathan Machabæus inhabited, a place often remembered in the Scriptures. It standeth in the common way from Samaria towards Hiernsalem: and is now called Byra.

Then the Village of Naioth where Saul prophesied; and near it Ephron, one of those Cities which Abijah recovered from Jeroboam; after the great overthrow given him. Then Kimblisaim, of the Levites, of which Jos. 21. 22. which Junius thinks to be the same with Jochembam, of which Chro. 6. 28. As for Abijahs Basalgor, which they find hereabout, Junius reads it, in the Plain of Chetzor; and findes it in the Tribe of Juda; as Jos. 15. we read of two Chetzors in that Tribe; one near Kedesh, ver. 23. and the other the same as Chetzor, ver. 25.

In this Tribe also they find the City of Mello; whose Citizens, they say, joyned with the Sichemites in making the Bastard Abimelee King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Solomon raised a Tribute upon the people. But it seems that Mello, or Millo is a common name of a strong Fort or Citadel: and so Junius, for domus Millo, reads incala munitionis, and for Solomo edificavit Millo, he reads edificabat munitionem, and so the Septuagint read it ἡ ἀκρόα in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Solomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Hiernsalem.

The other Cities of mark in Ephraim, are Tabnach, whose King was slain by Josua; and Janoach, or Janoah, spoiled by Teglaiphalsar: Pekah then governing Israel, with divers others, but of no great fame. The Mountains of Ephraim sometime signifie the greatest part of the Land of the sons of Josaph, on the West of Jordan: several parts whereof are the Hill of Samrom, or Samaria, 1 Reg.

16. 24. * the Hill of Gabas, Juc. 8. 2. 9. the Hill of Istalon, or Salmon, Judg. 9. 48. the Hills of the Region of Tisph, or Tophim, Judg. 9. 5. where Rama-Isofphim stood, which was the City of Samuel.

The great plenty of fruitful Vines upon the sides of the Mountains, was the occasion that Jacob in the spirit of prophecy, Gen. 49. 22. compared Josaph two branches, Ephraim and Manasse, to the branches of a fruitful Vine planted by the Well side, and spreading where the (a) Daughter branches along the Wall: which Allegory also Ezek. 22. in his Lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim) proleptically: as also in his Lamentation for Juda, he followeth the other Allegory of Jacob, Gen. 49. 9. comparing Juda to a Lion. Upon the top of one of the highest of these Hills of Ephraim, which overlooketh all the Plains on both sides of Jordan, they find the Castle called Dok: which they make to be the same with Dagon, of which Jos. 1. bell. Jud. 2. in which Castile, as it is 1 Mac. 16. Ptolomy most traitorously at a banquet, slew Simon Machabæus his father-in-law.

Among the Rivers of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gaas, remembered in the second of Samuel, c. 23. v. 30. where though Junius read, Hiddai ex una vallium Gabai: yet the Vulgar and Vatablus read Giddai, of the river of Gaas. Also in this Tribe they place the river of Carith, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great drought: where he was (b) fed with the Ravens: and after that the River was dried up, he travelled (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sidon: where he was relieved by the poor widow of Zarepta, whose dead son he revived, and increased her pittance of Meal and Oil: whereby she sustained her life.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes, from Jeroboam to Achab.

OF the first Kings of Israel I omit in this place to speak and referve it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Juda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the division from Juda and Benjamin, now it followeth to speak. The first of these Kings Jeroboam the son of Nebat, an Ephraimite, of Zereda, who being a man of strength and courage, was by Solomon made overseer of the buildings of the Munition in Hiernsalem, for as much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim and Manasse: and so many of them as wrought in those works. During which time, as he went to Hierusalem, he encountered the Prophet Abijah: who made him know that he was by God declined to be King of Israel, and to command ten of the twelve tribes. After this, fearing that those things might come to Solomon's knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shishak, whom Eusebius calleth Ofsechor, whose Daughter he married: the Predecessor of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertain Adad the Edumean, when he was carried young into Egypt from the fury of David, and his Captain Joab; which Adad the King of Egypt married to his Wives sister Taphner; using both him and Jeroboam as instruments to shake the Kingdom of Judah, that himself might the easier spoil it, as he did: for in the fifth year of Reboam's, Shishak sackt the City of Hierusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of David and Solomon, and all the spoils which David took from Adadexor of Soba, with the presents of Tob, King of Hamath, which were of an inestimable value.

This Jeroboam after the death of Solomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to govern the Israelites, and from a mean man exalted to that State: yet preferring the policies of the world before the service and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes under his rule should repair to Hierusalem to do their usual Sacrifices, they might be drawn from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calves, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Aaron's Calf in Horeb): further he made election of his Priests out of the basest and unlearned people. This King made his chief Seat and Palace at Sichem: He despised the warning of the Judean Prophet, whom Josaphat calleth Adon, and Glycas Joel: his hand thereafter withered, and was again restored; but continuing in his Idolatry, and hardened, upon occasion that the Prophet returning, was slain by a Lion; Abijah makes him know that God purposed to root out his posterity.

He was afterward overthrown by Abia King of Juda, and died after he had governed two and twenty years; whom Nadab his son succeeded: who in the second year of his reign, together with all the race of Jeroboam, was slain, and rooted out by Baspha, who reigned in his stead: so Nadab lived King but two years.

Baspha the son of Abijah, the third King after the partition, made war with Aja King of Juda: he seated himself in Thersa: and fortified Rama against Juda, to restrain their excursions. Hereupon Aja entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who invaded Nephtalim, and destroyed many places therein: the mean while Aja carried away the materials, with which Baspha intended to fortify Rama: but being an Idolater, he was threatened by Jehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Jeroboam: which afterward came to pass: He ruled four and twenty years, and died.

To Baspha succeeded Ela his son, who at a feast at his Palace of Thersa, was in his cups slain by Zambri, after he had reigned two years: and in him the prophesie of Jehu was fulfilled.

Zambri succeeded Ela, and assumed the name of a King seven daies; but Ambris in revenge of the Kings murder, set upon Zambri, or Zimri, and inclosed him in Thersa, and inforced him to burn himself.

Ambris or Honri succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regal seat from Thersa to Samaria: which he bought of Sheuer, built, and fortified it. This Ambris was also an Idolater no less impious than the rest: and therefore subjected to Tabremmon King of Syria, the father of Benhadad, according to Eusebius, Nicephorus, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I do not well conceive; seeing Benhadad the son of Tabremmon was invited by Aja King of Juda, to assail Baspha King of Israel, the father of Ela, who forewent Ambris. This Ambris reigned twelve years, six in Thersa, and six in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Atthalia.

§. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the captivity of the ten Tribes.

Achab, or Ahab succeeded Omr, who not alone upheld the Idolatry of Jeroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians: but he married Jezabel the Zidonian: and as Jeroboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian: and erected an Altar and a Grove to Baal in Samaria. He suffered Jezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Elias prevailed in the trial of the sacrifice, and killed the false Prophets; and afterward fled for fear of Jezabel.

Benhadad not long after besieged Samaria: & taken by Ahab, was by him set at liberty: for which, the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michas)

Michas) reproved him: afterward he caused Naboth by a false accusation to be stoned. Then joining with Josaphat in the war for the recovery of Ramoth, he was slain, as Atichabas had foretold him.

He had three sons named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Joram, and Jos: besides twenty other sons by sundry wives and concubines.

Ochozias succeeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: he bruised himself by a fall: and sent for counsel to Beelzebub the god of Achaz. Eliab the Prophet meeteth the Messenger on the way: and mistaking that Ochozias sought help from that dead Idol, asked the Messenger, if there were not a God in Israel? Ochozias sendeth two Captains, and with each 50. souldiers, to bring Eliab unto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire. The third Captain besought mercy at Eliab's hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the King, avowing it to the King that he must then die; which came to pass in the second year of his reign.

Joram, the brother of Ochozias by Jezabel, succeeded. He allured Josaphat King of Juda, and the King of Edom to assist him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000. sheep. The three Kings wanted water for themselves and their horses in the Deserts. The Prophet Elisha causeth the ditches to flow. The Moabites are overthrown: their King fleeth to Kirharseth, and being besieged, according to some Expositors; burnt his son on the walls as a sacrifice, wherat the three Kings, moved with compassion, returned and left Moab, wasting and spoiling that Region: Others, as it seems with better reason, understand the Text to speak of the son of the King of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to have been taken prisoner by the Moabites, and that the King of Moab threw him over the walls, threatening, unless the siege were dissolved, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his gods. Wherupon the King of Edom besought those of Juda and Israel to break off the siege for the safety of his son: which when the other Kings refused to yield unto, and that Moab, according to his former threatening, had burnt the King of Edom's son upon the Rampire, that all the Assailants might discern it, the King of Edom being by this sad spectacle enraged, forsook the party of the other Kings, for want of whose assistance the siege was broken up.

After this the King of Aram sent to Joram, to heal Naaman the Captain of his Army of the Leprosie. The answer of Joram was, Am I God to kill, and to give life, that he doth send to heal a man of his Leprosie: adding, that the Aramite fought but matter of quarrel against him. Elisha hearing thereof, willed the King to send Naaman to him; promising that he should know that there was a Prophet in Israel: and so Naaman was healed by washing himself seven times in Jordan. Elisha refused the gifts of Naaman; but his servant Gehazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the sellers of spiritual gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians, of Simon Magus.

Afterward Benhadad King of Aram, or Damascus, having heard that this Prophet did discover to the King of Israel whatsoever the Aramite consulted in his secretest counsel: sent a troop of horse to take Elisha: all whom Elisha struck blind, and brought them captives into Samaria: Joram then asked leave of the Prophet to slay them, Elisha forbade him to harm them: but caused them to be fed, and sent back to their own Prince in safety.

The King of Aram, notwithstanding these benefits, did again attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extremest famine. Joram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Elisha. Elisha by prayer caused a noise of Chariots and Armour to sound in the air, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege. An act of great admiration, as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Azael obtained the Kingdom of Syria by the death of his Master, Joram entering upon his frontier, took Ramoth-Gilead: in which war he received divers wounds, and returned to Jezreel to be cured. But whilst he lay there, Jehu (who commanding the Army of Joram in Gilead, was anointed King by one of the children of the Prophets sent by Elisha) surprised and slew both him and all that belonged unto him, rooting out the whole posterity of Ahab.

Jehu, who reigned after Jehoram, destroyed not only the race of his fore-goers, but also their religion; for which he received a promise from God, That his seed should occupy the Throne unto the fourth generation. Yet he upheld the Idolatry of Jeroboam, for which he was plagued with grievous war, wherein he was beaten by Shazriel the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countreys to the East of Jordan: in which war he was slain, saith Cedrenus; wherof the Scriptures are silent. Jehu reigned 28. years.

Joachaz, or Jehoachaz the son of Jehu succeeded his father, whom Azael and his son

Benhadad often invaded, and in the end subdued, leaving him only 50. horse, 20. chariots, and 10000. foot : and, as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Joachaz reigned 17. years.

After Joachaz, Joas his son governed Israel, who when he repaired to Elisba the Prophet as he lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories over the Aramites : and first commanded him to lay his hand on his bow, and Elisba covered the Kings hands with his, and bad him open the window Westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. He again willed him to beat the ground with his arrows, who smote it thrice, and ceased : The Prophet then told him, that he should have smitten five or six times, and then he should have had 10 many victories over the Aramites as he gave strokes. And so it succeeded with Joas, who overthrew the Aramites in three battels, and recovered the Cities and Territory from Benhadad the son of Azazel, which his father Joachaz had lost. He also overthrew Azazias King of Juda, who provoked him to make the war, whereupon he entred Hierusalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Joas reigned sixteen years, and died ; in whose time also the Prophet Elisba exchanged this life for a better.

Jeroboam the third from Jehu, followed Joas his father, an Idolater, as his predecessors ; but he recovered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath which is near Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned one and forty years.

Zacharias the fifth and last of the house of Jehu, slain by Shallum his vassal, who reigned in his stead, governed six months. Shallum held the Kingdom but one month, being slaughtered by Menabem of the Gadites.

Menabem, who took revenge of Shallum, used great cruelty to those that did not acknowledge him : ripping the bellies of those that were with child. This Menabem being invaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of silver, which he exacted by a Tribute of fifty shekels from every man of wealth in Israel. Menabem governed twenty years.

Pekabiah, or Phaceia, or after Zonaras, Phaceia succeeded, and after he had ruled two years, he was slain by Phaca, or Pekab the Commander of his Army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekab's time, Phulasser, or Tiglat-Phlasser invaded the Kingdom of Is- rael, and vvon Jion, Abel-Bethmaacab, Janoach, Kedesh, Hazor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Galilee, carrying them captives into Affria : he was drawn in by Achaz King of Judea, against Pekab and Rezin, the last of the Adades. For Achaz being walled by Pekab of Israel, and by Rezin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church-riches, and therewith engaged the Affrian, who first suppressed that Monarchy of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel : and this inviting of the great Affrian, was the utter ruine of both States, of Israel, and of Judea. Pekab reigned 20. years.

Then Holbea, or Osea, who slew Pekab, became the vassal of Salmanser ; but hoping to shake off the Affrian yolk, he sought aid from So, or Sua, or Sebicus King of Egypt : which being known to the Affrian, he cast him into prison, besieged Samaria, and mastered it : carried the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Nineve in Affria, and into Rages in Media, and into other Eastern Regions, and there dispersed them : and re-planted Samaria with divers Nations, and chiefly with the Cutha (inhabiting about Cutha, a River in Persia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Casamei bounding upon Syria, and with those of sepharvaim (a people of sephar in Mesopotamia upon Euphrates, of whose conquest Senacherib vaunteth) also with those of Ava, which were of the ancient Avims, who inhabited the Land of the Philistims in Abrahams time, dwelling near unto Gaza, whom the Captivists rooted out : and at this time they were of Arabia the Desart, called Havai, willing to return to their ancient seats.

To these he added those of Chamath, or Amra, the ancient enemies of the Israelites, and sometime the Vassals of the Adads of Damascus, which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Affrian advise himself better than the Romans did. For after Titus and Vespasian had wasted the Cities of Judea and Hierusalem, they carried the people away captive : but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their own thin Garrisons, which soon decayed ; and thereby they gave that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who never could be driven thence again to this day.

And this transmigration, plantation, and displantation, happened in the year of the world, 3292, the sixth year of Ezekiah King of Juda : and the ninth of Hosea the last King of Israel.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Juda, Reuben, Gad, and the other half of Manasse.

§. I.

Of Dan, whereof Joppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Towns.

NOW following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, joyneth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last : of which Family there were numbred at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leaving their tribes with the rest in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their sons 66400. bearing arms. The first famous City in this Tribe on the Sea-coast was Joppe, or Japho, as in the 19. of Joshua : one of the most ancient of the world, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Hierusalem. From hence Jonas embarked himself when he fled from the service of God towards Tharhis in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this City received many changes : and while Judas Macchabeus governed the Jews, the Syrians that were garrison'd in Joppe, having their Fleet in the Port, invited 200. principal Citizens aboard them, and cast them all into the Sea : which Judas revenged by firing their Fleet, and putting the companies which sought to escape to the sword.

It was twice taken by the Romans, and by Cestius the Lieutnant utterly burnt and ruined. But in the year of Christ, 1250. Lodowick the French King gave it new Walls and Towers : It is now the Turks, and called Jaffa. There are certain Rocks in that Port, whereunto it is reported, that Andromeda was fastned with chains : and from thence delivered from the Sea-monster by Perseus. This fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Josephus, Solinus, and Pliny. Marcellus Scarrus during his office of Edileship, shewed the bones of this Monster to the people of Rome. S. Hierome upon Jonas cap. 9. speaks of it indifferently.

The next unto Joppe was Jammia, where Judas Macchabeus burnt the rest of the Syrian Fleet : the fire and flame whereof was seen at Hierusalem, 240. furlongs off. It had sometime a Bishops seat, saith Will. of Tyre ; but there is no sign of it at this time, that such a place there was.

After Jammia is the City of Ceth, or Gath, sometime Antedon, saith Volateran. And Jo Montanus seems to understand it. For he sets it next to Egypt, of all the Philistim Cities, and in the place of Antedon. But Volateran gives neither reason nor authority for his opinion ; for Ptolomy sets Antedon far to the South of Joppe, and Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philistims : and about sixteen miles from Joppe : where S. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the same name. It was sometime the habitation and Seminary of the Anakims, strong and Giant-like men, whom Joshua could not expel, nor the Danites after him, nor any of the Israelites, till Dauids time : who slew Goliath, as his Captains did divers others not much inferior in strength and stature unto Goliath.

Roboam the son of Solomon rebuilt Geth : Ozias the son of Amazias destroyed it again. It was also laid waste by Azazel King of Syria. Fulke the fourth King of Hierusalem, built a Castle in the same place out of the old ruins. Whether this Geth was the same that Will. of Type in the Holy war calls Bethlin, I much doubt: the error growing by taking Geth for Abbedon.

Not far from Geth or Gath standeth Bethseles, or the house of the Sun. In the fields adjoining to this City (as is thought) was the Ark of God brought by a yoke of two Kine, turned loose by the Philistines: and the Bethseles presuming to look therein, there were slain of the Elders seventy, and of the people fifty thousand, by the ordinance of God. After which slaughter, and the great lamentation of the people, it was called the great Abel, faith S. Hierome. Beneditus Theologus findes three other Cities of this name; one in (a) Nephthalim: another in Juda: and another in Issachar. Hierome findes a fifth in Benjamin.

Keeping the Sea-coast, the strong City of Accaron offereth it self, sometime one of the five Satrapies, or Governments of the Philistines. S. Hierome makes it the same with Ascalon Palestina. Pliny confounds it with Apollonia: it was one of those that defended it self against the Danites and Edumans. It worshipped Beelzebub, the god of Horsets or Flies. To which Idol it was that Abaziah King of Israell sent to enquire of his health: whose messengers Eliab meeting by the way, caused them to return with a sorrowful answer to their Master. This City is remembered in many places of Scripture.

Christiannus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Eckron. This Azotus or Azod, was also an habitation of the Amorites, whom Josias (b) failed to destroy, though he once possessed their City. Herein stood a sumptuous Temple, dedicated to the (c) Idol Dagon: the same Idol which fell twice to the ground of it self, after the Ark of God was by the Philistines carried into their Temple: and in the second fall, it was utterly broken and defaced. Neer it was that famous (d) Judas Maccabaeus slain by Bacchides and Alcinus the Lieutenants of Demetrius. Afterward it was taken by Jonathas: and the rest of the Citizens being put to the sword, all that fled into the Temple of Dagon, were with their Idol therein consumed with fire: neer which also he overthrew Apollonius.

Gabinus the Roman rebuilt it. It had a Bishop seat while Christianity flourished in those parts. But in S. Hierome's time it was yet a fair Village. And this was the last of the Sea-Towns within the Tribe of Dan.

The Cities which are within the Land Eastward from Azotus, and beyond the Fountain of Ethiopia, wherein Philip the Apostle baptized the Eunuch, are Tzobah, or Sarxa, and Ephraim, and between them Castor Danis neer Hebron: though this place where Sampson was born, may seem by the words, Judg. 18. 12. to be in the Tribe of Judab, as the other also were bordering Towns between Dan and Juda.

After these within the bounds of Juda, but belonging to the Danites, they find Gedor, or as it is 1 Mac. 15. Cedron, which Condeban the Lieutenant of Antiochus fortified against the Jews, and neer which himself was by the Macchabees overthrowen.

Then Modin the Native City of the Macchabees: and wherein they were buried, on whose Sepulchre the seven Marble Pillars, which were erected of that height, as they served for a mark to the Sea-men, remained many hundreds of years after their first setting up, as Brochard and Breidenbach witness.

There are besides these the City of Cariat thiarim, that is, the City of the woods: situated in the border of Juda, Benjamin, and Dan, wherein the Ark of God remained twenty years in the house of Aminadab: till such time as David carried it thence to Hierusalem. Of this place (as they say) was Zacharias the son of Barachias, or Jehoiada, who was slain between the Temple and the Altar: also Urias, whom Joachim King of Hierusalem slaughtered, as we find in Jeremy. Many other places which they place in this Tribe, rather, as I take it, upon presumption than warrant, omit: as that of Caspin taken with great slaughter by Judas Macchabaeus: and Lechie, whose King was slain by Josias, in which also Amaziah was slain: The same which Senacherib took, Ezekias reigning in Juda.

Of other Cities belonging to this Tribe, see in Josias c. 19. from the ver. 41. where also it is added, that the Danites portion was too little for their number of Families: and therefore that they invaded Lechem, and inhabited it: which City, after amplified by Philip, the brother of Herod Antipas, was called Caesarea Philippi, as before, and made the Metropolis of Ituraea, and Trachonitis: of which coasts this Philip was Tetrach: but of this City see more in Nephtalim. In this Tribe there are no Mountains of fame.

It hath two Rivers or Torrents: the Northern-most rising out of the Mountains of Juda: and passing by Modin, falleth into the Sea by Sachrona. The other hath the name of of Sorek or Sored, whose banks are plentiful of Vines which have no seeds or stones: the wine they yield is red, of excellent colour, taste, and flavour, &c. In this Valley of Sorek, so called from the River, inhabited Dalila whom Sampson loved.

6. II. THE TRIBE OF SIMEON.

The Tribe of Simeon takes up the rest of the Sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Egypt: who being the second son of Jacob by Lea, there were increased of that Family while they abode in Egypt, as they were numbered at Mount Sinai, 59300. able men, all which ending their lives in the Desert, there entered the Land of Promise of their issue 22200. bearing arms, who were in part mixed with Juda, and in part severed, inhabiting a small Territory on the Sea-coast, belonging to Edumaea, of which the first City adjoining to Dan, was Ascalon.

The Reguli, or petty Kings thereof, were called Ascalonites: of which Volateran out of Xanthus, in the History of the Lydians, reports that Tantalus and Ascalus were the sons of Hymenaeus: and that Ascalus being employed by Acianus King of the Lydians, with an Army in Syria, falling in love with a young Woman of that Country, built this City, and called it after his own name: The same hath Nicolas in his History, faith Volateran.

Diodorus Siculus in his third Book remembereth a Lake neer Ascalon, wherein there hath been a Temple dedicated to Derceto, the Goddess of the Syrians; having the face of a Woman, and the body of a Fish: who, as I have said before in the story of Ninnus, was the mother of Semiramis, feigned to be cast into this Lake, and fed and relieved by Doves. And therefore was the Dove worshipped both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the Poet:

Alba Palestino sancta Columba Syro.

The white Dove is for holy held in Syria Palestine.

It was one of the chiefest and strongest Cities of the Philistines. It bred many learned Men (faith Volateran, as Antiochus, Sofus, Cygnus, Dorotheus the Historian, and Artemidorus, who wrote the story of Bithynia.

In Ascalon, as some say, was that wicked Herod born, that seeking after our Saviour, caused all the Male-children of two years old and under to be slain. In the Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that, which it was by the Saladine defaced, Richard King of England, while he made war in the Holy Land, gave it a new Wall and many buildings. Ejus murus cum Saladino diruisset, Richardus Anglorum Rex instauravit, faith Adrichomaeus.

In David's time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistines: for he nameth Gath and Ascalon onely, when he lamenteth the death of Saul and Jonathan: not speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Sem. 1: Gath, nor publish it not in the streets of Ascalon: It is now called Scalona. Gabinus restored it as he did Azotus and Gaza.

Next to Ascalon stood Gaza, or Gazera, which the Hebrews call Hazzaz, the Syrians, Azaz, or Azonus (as they say) the son of Hercules. Other profane writers affirm, that it was built by Jupiter. Pomp. Mela gives the building thereof to Cambyses the Persian; because belike he re-built it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much to say, as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistines, and the South bound of the land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this City was far more ancient than Cambyses, as it is proved by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire of Persia, it received a Garrison for Darius: in despite whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long siege demolished, and was called Gaza ani, 19. of the Desert.

Alexander Janens King of the Jews surprised it, and slew five hundred Senators in the Temple of Apollo, which fled thither for Sanctuary: but this Gaza was not set up in the same place again, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had overturned, but somewhat neerer the Sea side: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Town of great account in the time of the Macchabees, and gave many wounds to the Jews, till it was forsaken by Simon: of which he made no great account, as that he purposed to reside therein himself, and in his absence left John his Son and Successor to be Governor. In Brochard his time it was still a goodly City, and known by the name of Gazara.

At the very out-let of the River of Bejor, standeth Majoma the Port of Gaza: to which the privilege of a City was given by the great Constantine, and the place called Constance, after the name of the Emperours Son. But Julian the Apollonia soon after favouring the Gazarians, made it subject unto them, and commanded it to be called Gaza maritima.

Jos. 13. 11. On the other side of Befor standeth Antidon, defaced by Alexander Jannæus, retored by Herod, and called Agrippias, after the name of Agrippa, the favorite of Augustus.

Then Raphia, where Philopater overthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whose Torrent is known in the Scriptures by the name of *the Torrent of Egypt, till the Septuagint converted it Rinocura: to difference it, Ex. 27. 12. giving the name of the City to the Torrent that watereth it. Pliny calls it Rhinocolura: and Josephus Rhinocorra: (a) Epiphanius reports it as a Tradition, that at this place the world was divided by lot, between the three Sons of Noah.

Within the Land, and upon the River of Befor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth between Kadeß and Shur, Gen. 20. 1. That it was near to the Wilderness of Beer-shebah, it appears Gen. 20. 31. and therefore no marvel that as elsewhere Beer-sheba, so sometime Gerar, be made the South bound of Canaan. It was of old a distinct Kingdom from the Philistim Satrapies: the Kings by one common name were called Abimelechs; S. Hierome saith that afterwards it was called Regio salutaris, the healthy Country: so that it was no marvel that Abraham and Saac lived much in those parts. Of King Asa's conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2 Chron. 14. 14.

More within the Land was Siceleg, or Tig-lak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when David in his flying from Saul to the Philistims had left his carriages there, but David followed them over the River of Befor, and put them to the laughter, and recovered the prey.

Next Dabir sometime Cariat-Seph, a City of Letters, the University, as they say, or Academy of old Palestine. In Saint Hierome's time, it seems, it had the name of Dama: Jos. 15. 49. it is called Orbs Samme: from the name, as it seems, of some of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Orbs Arbahi. For even hence also were these Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othaniel, encouraged by Caleb's promise of his Daughter in marriage: but that Josiah and the Host of Israel were at the surprize, it appears Jos. 10. 39. This City Jos. 21. 17. is named among those which out of Simoon and Juda were given to the Levites. And hence it seems they attribute it to this Tribe.

Besides these, there are many others in the Tribe of Simoon, but of less fame, as Hajin, of which Jos. 19. 7. which also Jos. 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Levites, given out of the portion of Juda and Simoon. (For which Jannin thinks Hajin is named 1 Chron. 6. 59. though * in the place of Josua these two are distinguished) also Tholad, so named 1 Chron. 4. 29 for which Jos. 19. 4. we have Eltholad, Chazar-Sufa, so named, Jos. 19. 5. for which Jos. 15. we have Chazar-Gadda, both names agreeing in signification: for Gadda is Turma, and Sufa Equitatus.

In the same places of Josua and of the Chronicles, Chorma is named, which they think to be the same with that of which Num. 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites pursued the Israelites: But that Chorma cannot be in Simoon, nor within the Mountains of Edumæa. For Israel fled not that way: but back again to the Camp, which lay to the South of Edumæa, in the Desert.

The same places also name Beer-sheba in this Tribe: so called of the Oath between Abraham and Abimelech: neer unto which Hagar wandered with her son Ismael. It was also called the City of Isaac, because he dwelt long there. While the Christians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to strengthen this place, standing on the border of the Arabian Desert, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simoon which are named in the places of Josua, and of the Chronicles above noted, because they help us nothing in story, I omit them. In the time of Ezekia King of Juda, certain of this Tribe being strengthened in his own Territories, passed to * Gedor, as it is 1 Chron. 4. 39. (the same place which Jos. 15. 36. is called Gedera and Gedrothaima), which at that time was inhabited by the issue of Cham: where they defeated themselves: as also five hundred others of this Tribe, destroyed the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountains of Edom, and dwelt in their Cities.

The Mountains within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampson the chiefest: unto which he carried the Gate-post of Gaza. The Rivers are, Befor, and the Torrent of Egypt, called Shichar, as is noted in Asfor.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF JUDA.

OF Juda, the fourth son of Jacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600. all which (Caleb excepted) perished in the Deserts. And of their sons there entered the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing arms. Agreeable to the greatness of this number was the greatest Territory given, called afterward Judea: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simoon included. And many Cities named in those those Tribes, did first, as they say, belong unto the Children of Juda: who had a kind of Sovereignty over them: as Succoth, Cariat-hiarim, Lachis, Bethsemer, Tiglag, Beer-sheba, and others. The multitude of people within this small Province (if it be meted by that ground given to this Tribe only) were incredible, if the witness of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when David numbered the people, they were found five hundred thousand fighting men.

The Cities of Juda were many. But I will remember the chiefest of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which standeth in the entrance of Judea from Idumæa: whose King first surprized the Israelites as they passed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, and took from them some spoils, and many prisoners: who being afterward overthrown by the Israelites, the sons of Keni, the Kinsmen of Moses, obtained a possession in that Territory: who before the coming of the Israelites, dwelt between Madian and Amalek.

Following this Frontier towards Idumæa and the South, Ascensus Scorpionis, or Acra-bim is placed: the next to Arad: so called because of Scorpions, which are said to be in that place: from which name of Acra-bim, Hierome thinks that the name of the Toparchie, called Acra-bimena, was denominated: of which we have spoken in Manasse. On the South side also of Judea they place the Cities of Jagar, Dimona, Adada, Ceder, Albna, Jeshnan, and Afor, or Chasfor, most of them Frontier Towns.

And then Zipb: of which there are two places so called: one besides this in the body of Juda, of which the Desert and Forrest adjoining took name: where David hid himself from Saul. After these are the Cities of Efson, Adar, Karkab, and Ascamona, or Hajmon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumæa towards the North, we find the Cities of Danna, Shemab, Anan, the other Afor, or Chasfor, Behaloth, and the two Sochos: of all which see Jos. 15. 25. called Cariath, by Jos. 15. 25. called Kerith: whence Judas the Traitor was called Is-cariath, as it were a man of Cariath. Then Hethan, the abode of Sampson, which Reboam re-edified. Beyond these, towards the North border, and towards Elutheropolis, is the City of Jethar, or Jathir, belonging to the Levites. In Saint Hierome's time it was called Jethira: and inhabited altogether with Christians: neer unto this City was that remarkable battel fought between Afa King of Juda, and Zara King of the Arabians, who brought into the field a Million of fighting men: and was notwithstanding beaten and put to flight: Afa following the victory as far as Gerar, which at the same time he recovered.

Not far from Jether standeth Jarmuth, whose King was slain by Josua, and the City overturned. Next unto it is Maresa the Native City of the Prophet Michea: between it and Odolla, Judas Macchabeus overthrew Gorgias, and sent thence ten thousand Dragmas of silver to be offered for sacrifice.

Odolla, or Hadullam it self, was an ancient and magnificent City, taken by Josua, and the King thereof slain. Jonathan Macchabeus beautified it greatly. Then Seila, or Keila, afterward Echela, where David sometime hid himself: and which afterward he delivered from the assaults of the Philistims: neer which the Prophet Abacuc was buried: whose monument remained, and was seen by S. Hierome.

Neer it is Hebron, sometime called the City of Arbah, for which the Vulgar hath Cariat-sharbe: the reason of this name they give, as if it signified the City of four: because the four Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were therein buried, but of Adam it is but supposed: and it is plain by the places, Jos. 14. 14. and 15. 13. and 20. 11. that Arbah here doth not signify four, but that it was the name of the Father of the Giants, called Anakim, whose son as it seems Anak was: and Acibian, Shelbai, and Talmai, (whom Caleb expelled, Jos. 15.) were the sons of Anak, Num. 13. 23. The name of Anak signifieth Torquem, a chain worn for ornament; and it seems that this Anak, enriched by the spoils which himself and his father got, wore a chain of gold, and so got this name: and leaving the custom to his posterity, left also the name: so that in Latine the name of Anakim may not amiss be expounded by Torquati.

The City Hebron was one of the ancientest Cities of Canaan, built seven yeers before TJoan, or Tanis, in Egypt: and it was the head and chief City of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part given, to wit, the Villages adjoining, and the rest to the Levites. It had a Bishop in the Christian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the mother of Constantine.

Not far hence they find Elutheropolis, or the free City, remembered often by Saint Hierome. Then Eglon, whose King Dabir associated with the other four Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Hierusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, and Lachis, besieging the Gibeonites, were by Josua utterly overthrown. From hence the next City of fame was Enans, afterward Nicopolis, one of the Cities of Governments.

vernment or Presidencies of Judea. In fight of this City, Judas Maccabaeus (after he had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Seron) gave a third overthrow to Gorgias, Lieutenant to Antiochus.

In the year 1301. it was overturned by an earthquake, saith Eusebius. In the Christian times it had a Bishops seat of the Diocese of Cesarea of Palestine.

From Emaus toward the West Sea, there are the Cities of Nabamah, Bethdagon, and Gader, or Gedera, or Gederotaima, of which, and of Gederoth, * Jos. 15. 36. and 41. Then Asceba, to which Josiah followed the slaughter of the five Kings before named, a City of great strength in the Valley of (a) Terebinto, or Turpentine, as the Vulgar readeth, * Sam. 17. 2. whence (as it seems) they fear it even unto Soco, and unto Lebna of the Levites. It revolted from the subjection of the Jews while Joram the son of Jehoshaphat ruled in Hierusalem: And next unto this standeth Asceda, which Josiah utterly dispeopled.

On the other side of Emaus towards the East standeth Bethsur, otherwise Bethjora, and Bethfor: one of the strongest and most fought for places in all Juda. It is seated on a high Hill, and therefore called Bethsur (the house on the Rock, or of strength.) It was fortified by Roboam, and afterward by Judas Maccabaeus. Lysias forc't it: and Antiochus Entapor by famine. Jonathas regained it: and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified against the Syrian Kings.

Bethleem is the next unto it within six miles of Hierusalem, otherwise Lehem: sometime Ephrata; which name, they say, it had of Caleb's wife, when as it is so called by Moses before Caleb was famous in those parts, Gen. 38. 16. Of this City was Abessan, or Isban Judge of Israel after Jephthah, famous for the thirty sons and thirty daughters begotten by him. Eliamelec was also a Bethleemite, who with his wife Naomi sojourn'd in Moab during the famine of Juda in the time of the Judges, with whom Ruth the daughter-in-law of Naomi returned to Bethleem: and married Booz, of whom Obed, of whom Isai, of whom David. It had also the honour to be the native City of our Saviour Jesus Christ; and therefore shall the memory thereof never end.

In Zabulon of Galilee there was also a City of the same name: and therefore was this of our Saviour called Bethleem Juda.

From Bethleem some four or five mile standeth Thebez, the City of Amos the Prophet: and to this place adjoining is the City of Bethzancaria, in the way between Bethjora and Hierusalem: on whose Hills adjoining, the glorious guilt shields of Antiochus shined like lamps of fire in the eyes of the Jews. The City of * Bezek was also near unto Bethleem, which Adoni-Bezek commanded; who had during his reign tortur'd 70. Kings, by cutting off the Joynts of their Fingers and Toes; and made them gather bread under his Table: but at length the same end befell himself by the sons of Juda, after they had taken him prisoner.

The rest of the Cities in this part (most of them of no great estimation) we may pass by, until we come to the magnificent Castle of Hierodinus, which Herod erected on a Hill, mounting thereunto with 200. Marble steps, exceeding beautiful and strong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adjoining to the Desert of Jeruel, between it and Teke, is that Civitas floridus, where, in the time of Jehoshaphat, the Jews stood and lookt on the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, massacring one another, when they had purposed to joyn against Juda: near which place is the Valley of blessing, where the Jews the fourth day after, solemnly came and blessed God for so strange a deliverance.

Now the Cities of Juda which border the Dead Sea, are these; Aduran beautified by Roboam, and Tzohar, which the Vulgar calleth * Segor: so called, because Lot in his prayer for it, urged that it was but a little one: whence it was called Tzohar, which signifies a little one: when as the old name was Be-pur-lab, as it is Gen. 14. 2. In the Romans time it had a Garrison, and was called (as they say) Pannier: in Hierom's time, Balexona. Then Engaddi, or Hen-gaditi, first Asaphthamar: near unto which are the Gardens of Balsamum, the best that the world had called Ophobalsamum: the most part of all which Trees Cleopatra Queen of Egypt sent for out of Judea, and Herod, who either feared or loved Anthony her Husband, caused them to be rooted up, and presented unto her: which she re-planted near Heliopolis in Egypt. This City was first taken by Chedorloamer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the most remarkable Cities of Judea; and one of the Presidencies thereof.

The rest of the Cities are many in the Inland, and among them Yezrael: not that which was the City of Naboth, of which already; but another of the same name, the City of Acinoan, the wife of David, the mother of that Amnon whom Abalom slew: also, as some think, the City of Amasa, Abalom's Lieutenant, and the Commander of his Army. But this seemeth to be an error grounded upon the nearness of the words Yezrael and Jezrael: and because the 2 Sam. 17.

25. Amasa's father is called an Israelite, who in the first of the Chron. 2. 17. is called an Israelite: indeed the Hebrew Orthography sheweth that Amasa's father is not said to be of the City Yezrael, but an Israelite in Religion, though otherwise an Israelite.

In this Tribe there were many high Hills and Mountains: as those of Engaddi upon the Dead Sea: and the Mountains of Juda, which begin to rise by Emaus, and end near Taphna, and these part Juda from Dan and Simeon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron, at the foot whereof was that Oak of Mamre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham; which Saint Hieronymus calleth a Fir-tree, and saith, That it stood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that Mountain called Colhis Achille, on the South of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, inclosing the old Castle, erected by Jonathas Maccabaeus, and called Majada, garnished it with twenty seven high and strong Towers: and therein left Armour and Furniture for an hundred thousand men; being, as it seemeth a place unaccessible, and of incomparable strength.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Asphaltitis, this Country had four Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorrah, destroyed with fire from Heaven for their unnatural sins.

S. IV. THE TRIBE OF REUBEN, and his Borderers.

§. I.

The seats and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites man from Sehon King of Hesbon.

ON the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacob's sons inhabited: of whose children there were numbered at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Deserts, there remained to possess the Land promised 43700. bearing arms. But before we speak of these, or the rest that inhabited the East side of Jordan, something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon; whose Land in our Writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first we are to remember, that out of Abraham's kindred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and Jacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Jews: by Esau, or Edom, the Idumeans: by Ysmael, the eldest Son of Abraham, the Ysmaelites: and by Keturah, his last wife, the Midianites. And again, by Lot, Abraham's brothers son, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly possess'd by the Canaanites; and by the Families of them descended) these illuses and alliance of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Egypt, inhabited the frontier places adjoining.

Esau and his sons held Idumea, which bounded Canaan on the South, Ysmael took from the South-east part of the Dead Sea; stretching his possession over all Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Desert, as far as the River of Tygris, from Sur to Havilah.

Moab took the rest of the coast of the Dead Sea, leaving a part to Midian, and passing over Arnon, inhabited the Plains between Jordan and the Hills of Abarim, or Arnon, as far North as Ejsebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon fate down on the North-east side of Arnon, and possess'd the Tract from Rabba, afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountains of Gilbead, and without them as far forth as Arer, though in Moses time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him over the River of Jaboc, as they had done Moab over Arnon.

As these Nations compass'd sundry parts of Canaan, to the border between the River of Jaboc and Damascus, was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations: all which Territory on the East side of Jordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first possess'd by the Emims, a Nation of Giants weakened and broken by Chedorloamer, after repulsed by the Moabites, as before remembred. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territory and ancient possession of the Zamzumims, or Zutai, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorloamer, Amraphel, and the rest: and by them an easy way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written, that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be understood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancestor beaten the Moabites out of the plain Countries, between Abarim and Jordan, and driven them from Hesbon over Arnon; and this hapned not long before Moses' arrival upon that border, when Vakeb governed the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab when Moses pass'd Arnon, was not the son of Vakeb, but his name was Bala, the son of Zippor. And it may may be that those Kings were elective, as the Edumæans anciently were.

Now, all that part of Moab, between Arnon and Jordan, as far North as Esebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arrived there out of Egypt, it was in the possession of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amoreus: and therefore did Jephthab the Judge of Israel justly defend the regaining of those Countries against the claim of the Ammonites: because (as he alleged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab, or Ammon: who (saith Jephthab) had 300. years time to recover them, and did not: whence he inferreth, that they ought not to claim them now.

Judge. II.

And left any should marvel why the Ammonites in Jephthah's time should make claim to these Countries: whereas Moses in the place Num. 21.v.26. rather accounts them to have been the ancient possellion of the Mobites, than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted, that Deut. 3. 11. when it is said that the Iron bed of Og was to be seen at Rabbath, the chief City of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israelites possellied, was by him or his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sejon's was from the Mobites.

Vol 13, 28

Junius notes that the one half of the land of Hammon, which in this place of Jofua is said to have been given to the Gadites, was taken first from the Ammonites by Sehon: but the place, Deut. 2. 11. proves that, as well as Sehon had gotten lands out of the hands of the Ammonites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were feared to confounded together, that it was hard to distinguish them; so also were the sons of Isaac and Ammon, Madian, Amalec, and Jismael. Yet the reason seemeth plain enough why Ammon commanded in chief, in Jephthah's time; for sometime the one Nation, is sometime the other of all those borders acquired the Sovereignty: and again, that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely, within the Mountains of Galaad, or Gilead, and as far South as Aroer, belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking advantage of the time, they then sought how to recover it again. Yet at such time as Moses overthrew Sehon at Jabok, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites all that part of their possession which lay about Aroer, and between it and Jaboc: Sehon and Og, two Kings of the Amorites, having displanted both Moab and Ammon of all within the Mountains. For it is written in Numb. 21. 24, that Israel conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon unto Jaboc, even unto the children of Ammon: so as at this time the River of Jaboc was the South bound of Ammon within the Mountains, when as anciently they had also possessions over Jaboc, which at length the Gadites possit, as in the thirteenth Chapter of Jesua, verse twenty five, it appears.

— II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THe chief Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemoth, for which the 15th Vulgar, without any shew of warrant, readeth Jethson. The Vulgar or Hierome followed the Septuagint, those two Verses, 36. and 37. in Job. 22. being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedson for Kedmoth, which Kedson by writing slip into Jethson.

This City which they gave to the Levites, imparts her name to the Defart adjoyning: it was from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Sehon. In the same place of Vulgar, where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Volgar for Bejor et villa jae, reads Bejor in solitudine jae without any ground from the Hebrew whence Adrichomius makes a Town called Mjor. In the border between Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth, near the Dead sea (for the Country between being Mountainous, hath few Cities) they place two Towns of note, Lafa or Lephaf, of which Genesius 10. vers. 19. The Greeks call Cullisboon near which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweet water; all which foon after they rising, being joyned in one stream, do make a very wholesome Bath, especially for all contraction of sinews: to which Herod the elder, when he was desperat of all other help, repaired, but in vain. Others say, that these Springs arise out of the Hills of Macherus in this Tribe. The like fountains are found in the Pyrenes, and in Peru, called the Baths of the Inga's, or Kings. The other Town is Macherus, the next between Lafa and Jordan: of all that part of the world the strongest Inland City and Castle, standing upon a Mountain every way unaccessable. It was first fortified by Alexander Jannaeus, who made it a frontier against the Arabians: but it was demolished by Gabinus in the war with Artababas, saith Josephus. It was thither (saith Josephus) that Herod sent John Baptist, and wherein he was slain: his Army soon after being utterly overthrowen by Arabs King of Arabia, and himself after this manner never prospering. Not far from Macherus was Bojor, or Bozra, a town of refuge, and belonging to the Levites, and near it Livias upon Jordan, which Herod built in honour of Livia, the mother of Tiberius Celsus

To the North of Livias is Setim, or Sit-tim: where the children of Israel embraced the daughters of Adonian, or Adiab; and where

Phineas

Phineas pierced the body of Zinuri and Cobi with his spear, bringing due vengeance upon them when they were in the midst of their sin; and from hence Josua sent the discoverers to view Jericho, staying here until he went over Jordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adriboctinus dreams of, reading Joel 3. 18. irrigabit torrentem Setim : The Vulgar hath torrentem sinarum : and Junius, vallem Cedrorum : expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan; but for the Church, in which the just being planted, grow as the cedars, Psal. 92. 13.

The plain Country hereabout, by Moses called, The plains of Moab, where he expounded the book of Deuteronomy to the people a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same book precisely bounded by Moses. On the South it had the great Defart of Paran, where they had long wandered. On the East it had Chasferoth, and Dizabab (of which two, the former is that Gazarns, of which Prolony in Palestina : the later was a Tract belonging to the Nababether in Arabia Petraea, where was * Mezabab, of which Gen. 36.39, by the Geographers called Medwa, and Medaba. On the West it had Jordan, and on the North it had Laban (in junius edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban, Dent. 1.1.) the same which the Geographers call Libias : and some confound it with Livias, of which even now we spake.

Also on the same North side towards the confines of Celofyria it had Theopel: whereabout sometime Pella of Celofyria stood; which was in the Region of Decapole; and, as Stephanus saith, was sometime called Buthis. It is also noted in Moses to be over against, or near unto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the Red Sea, as also Num. 14. it tranlateth the word Suph in like manner: where-as in this place of Deuteronomy there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to signify the Sea: and yet the Scripture, when this word is so to be taken, useth the addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the Region of Suph, or Suph: which doubtless was about these plains of Maab towards the Dead Sea: where the Country being full of reeds, was therefore thus called: as also the Red Sea was called Mare Suph, for like reason.

The place in these large plains of Moaab where Moses made those divine exhortations, some say was Bethabara, where John baptized, which in the story of Gideon is called Beth-bara. Josephus says it was where atter the City Abila stood, near Jordan, in a place fret with Palm-trees: which sure was the same as Abel-sittim in the plains of Moaab.

Num. 33:49. (that some call Abel-fathim, and Bel-fathim) which is reckoned by Atafes in that place of Numbers for the 42. and last place of the Israeletes incamping in the time of Mofes: This place is also called Sittim: Numb. 15. 10.
Exo 15. 10. which word if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars than from Thorns, with Adricornus and others. It was the wood of which the Ark of the Tabernacle was made.

Toward the East of those plains of Moab, they place the Cities Nebo, Baal-Mon, Sibma, and Hesban the chief City of Schoon, and El-halel, and Kiriatbaim the seat of the Gittans Emin. Of the two first of these Moses seems to give a note that the names were to be changed, because they tasted of the Abominities * Idolatry. For Nebo (in stead of which Junius, Esa. 46. 1. reads Dens vaticinus) was the name of their Idol-Oracle, and Baal-memon, is the habitation of Baal. Of the same Idol was the Hill Nebo in these parts denominated: from whose top, which the common Translators call Phagab, Moses before his death saw all the land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which story Junius does not take Phagab, or Pisgab for any proper name: but Phagab for an appellative, signifying a Hill: and so also Vatabul in some places, as Num. 21. 20. where he noteth, that some call Pisgab that top which looketh to Jericho, and Hair as it looketh to Ataab, which opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the name of a City of Reuben, mentioned Jof. 13. 20. called Asduth-Pisga, which is as much as decursus Pisga: wit, where the waters did run down from Pisga. In the same place of Josia there is also named Beth-Peor, as belonging to Reuben: called from the Hill Peor: from whence also Baal the Idol was called Baal-Peor; which, they say, was the same as Priapus: the chief place of whose worship seems to have been Bamoth-Bahal, of which also Jof. 13. in the Cities of Reuben: for which, Num. 22. 41. they read, the high places of Ebal (for so the word signifieth) to which place Balaak first brought Balaam to curse the Israelites.

II. III.

Of divers places bordering Reuben, belonging to Midian, Moab, or Edom.

There were besides these, divers places of note over Arnon, which adjoynto Reuben: amongst which they place Gallim, the City of Phalti: to whom Sad gave his daughter Michol from David: but Janus thinks this Town to be in Benjamin: gathering so much out of Esa. 10. 29. where it is named among the Cities of Benjamin. With better reason perhaps out of Num. 21. 19. we may say that Mathana and Nabaliel were in those confines of Reuben: through which places the Israelites past after they had left the Well, called Beer: Then Deblathaim, which the Prophet Hieremy threatneth with the rest of the Cities of Moab.

Madian also is found in these parts, the chief City of the Madianites in Moab: but not that Midian, or Madian by the Red Sea, wherein Jethro inhabited. For of the Madianites there were two Nations; of which these of Moab became Idolaters, and received an exceeding overthrow by a Regiment of twelve thousand Israelites, sent by Moses out of the Plains of Moab: at such time as Israel began to accompany their Daughters: their five Kings with Balaam the Soothsayer, were then slain, and their Regal City with the rest destroyed. The other Madianites, over whom Jethro was Prince or Priest, forgot not the God of Abraham their Ancestor; but relieved and assisted the Israelites in their painful travels through the Deserts: and were in all that passage their guides. In the South border of Moab adjoining to Edom, and sometime reckoned as the chief City of Edom, there is that Petra, which in the Scriptures is called Sela, which is as much as rupe, or petra. It was also called Yotbeel, as appears by the place, 2 Kings 14. 7.

It was built (saith Josephus) by Rezem, one of those five Kings of the Madianites: slain as before is said: after whom it was called Rezem. Now, they say, it is called Crac, and Mozera. The Soldans of Egypt, for the exceeding strength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Egypt and Arabia: of which it is the first and strongest City: the same perhaps which Pliny and Strabo call Nabathæ, whence also the Province adjoining took name: which name seems to have been taken at first from Nabathoth, the son of Abraham by Keturah. For Nabathæa is no where understood for all Arabia Petraea (at least where it is not mis understood) but it is that Province which neighboureth Judæa. For Pharan inhabited by Ismael, whose people Ptolomy calleth Pharanites, in stead of Ismaelites, and all those Territories of the Eufates, Madianites, Amalekites, Ismaelites, Edomites, or Idumeans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus, Sin, and of Qg King of Babylon, were parts of Arabia Petraea: though it be also true, that some part of Arabia the Desert belonged to the Amalekites, and Ismaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles the fifth, call Hagarans, of Hagar.

This City Petra, Scarus besieged with the Roman Army, and finding the place in shew impregnable, he was content, by the persuasion of Antipater, to take a composition of money, and to quit it. Yet Amasias King of Juda (after he had slaughtered ten thousand of the Arabians in the valley called Salmarum) was also this City. S. Hierome findes Ruth the Moabite to be natural of this City. In the mean time, when the Christians held the Kingdom of Hierusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, having before been under the Greek Church. It is seated not far from Hor, where Avron died, and on the other side towards the North is the River of Zared, or Zered, by which Moses encamped in the 38. station. Adrichomius describeth the waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and between Zared and Arnon: and so he doth the Valley of Save: but the waters of Nimra, or Beit-Nimra (for which it seems Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refresh the plains of Moab: and the confluence of those waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Save also cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, and under Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Assyrian and Perſian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Save, or Savah, which is the Kings Dale, where Abſolom set up his Monument, as it seems not far from Hierusalem. And at the same time Melchisedec King of Salem also encountered him. But Abraham coming from the North, and Melchisedec inhabiting, either nearer Bethſhan, otherwise Scythopolis, in the half Tribe of Manasse, or in Hierusalem (both places lying to the West of Jordan) could not encounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Save, which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

II. IV.

Of the Dead Sea.

NOW because the Sea of Sodom, or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Asphaltit, and the Salt Sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tiberias, which was fresh water) also the sea of the Wilderness, or rather the sea of the Plains, is often remembered in the Scriptures, and in this story also, therefore I think it not impertinent to speak somewhat thereof. For it is like unto the Caspian sea, which hath no out-let, or disburthening. The length of this Lake Josephus makes 180. furlongs (which make 22. miles and a half of ours) and about 150. in breadth, which make 18. of our miles, and somewhat more. Pliny makes makes it a great deal less: but those that have of late years seen this sea, did account it (saith Weſſenburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirty of ours) in length: and two and a half of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea, Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus est immenso ambitu, specie maris, sapore corruptione, gravitate odoris accolis pestifer: neque vento impellitur, neque pisces aut fuitas aquas volneres patitur, necvium unde superjecta ut solido feruntur, perit, imperitque nandi perinde atolluntur, &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a sea of a corrupt taste: of swell infectious, and pestilent to the borderers: it is neither moved nor raised by the winds, nor indueth fish to live in it, or fowl to swim in it. Those things that are cast into it, and the unskilfull of swimming, as well as the skilfull, are born up by the water. At one time of the year casteth it up Flumen: the art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is used in the trimming of ships, and the like businellies.

And then of the Land, he speaketh in this sort: The fields not far from this Lake, which were sometime fruitful, and adorned with great cities, were burnt with lightning; of which the ruins remain, the ground looking with a sad face, as having lost her fruitfulness; for whatsoever doth either grow, or is set thereon, be it fruits, or flowers, when they come to ripeness, having nothing within them, but moulder into ashes: Thus far Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that those Pomegranates, and other Apples or Oranges, which do still grow on the banks of this cursed Lake, do look fair, and are of good colour on the outside, but being cut, have nothing but dust within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake casteth up, it was by the Greeks called Asphaltit. Josephus desirous to be satisfied of this is reports, went of purpose to see this Lake, and caused certain Captives to be cast into it, who were not only unskilfull in swimming, but had their hands also bound behind them, yet notwithstanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not sink.

II. V.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Country within Arnon Reuben possesseth.

OF the Kings of Moab, whose Country (within Arnon) Reuben possesseth (though not taken from Moab, but from Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Junius in the 21.

of Num. v. 14. nameth Phabeb, which seems to be the Ancestor or Prodecellor of Balac, the son of Zippor: which Balac sent for Balaam to curse Israel. For fearing to contend with Moses by arms, by the examples of Sehon, and Og, he hoped by the help of Balaam's curſings or enchantments, to take from them all strength and courage, and to cast on them some pestilent diseases. And though Balaam at the first, moved by the spirit of God bleſt Israel, contrary to the hope and desire of Moab: yet being desirous in some sort to satisfy him, and to do him service, he advised Moab to send Madianitish women among the Israelites: hoping by them, as by instruments of mischief, to draw them to the Idolatry of the Heathen, but in the end, he received the reward of his falling from God, and of his evil counsell, and was slain among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

After these times the King of the Moabites are not named: saying that we find in the first of Chronicles the fourth, that okim, and the men of Chozeba, and Joſeph, and Sareph, all being of the issue of Juda, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse, These also are ancient things: to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these mens governments are no where extant or remaining, or as others, hoc prius fuisse, these Families of Juda were once thus famous: but now their posterity choole rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there.

Then we find Eglon King of Moab, who Judged: with the help of Ammon and Amalec mastered Israel, and commanded them 18 years: which Eglon, Ehud slew in his own house, and afterward 1000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had unto whom David fled fearing Saul, it doth not appear: or whether it were the same against whom Saul made war, it is not manifest, for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul, he received David, and relieved him: knowing that Saul sought his life.

After this, David himself entred the Region of Moab, but not likely in the same Kings time: for he slaughtered two parts of the people, and made the third part tributary: whereupon it was said of David, Moab is my wash-pot, over Edom will I cast my shoe: meaning that he would reduce them to such an abjection, and appoint them for base services: and that he would tread down the Idumeans.

The next King after David's time of the Moabites, whose name liveth, was Atſiſa, who falling from Juda, (perhaps in remembrance of the severity of David) fastened himself

^{2 Kings 1.} to the Kings of Israel, and ayd tribute to Abab, 100000 Lambs, and 200000 Rams with the wool: who revolting again from Israel after the death of Abab, was invaded by Jehoram, with whom joyned the Kings of Juda and Idumaea: and being by these three Kings preft and broken, he fled to Kir-hareseth, as is elsewhere shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name; when that Nation, assailed by the Ammonites and Idumaeans, invaded Jehoshaphat: and by reason of some private quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set upon the Idumaeans, and slaughtered them: and then one against another, as Jehoshaphat had a notorious victory over them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Hieremy the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was after Mefha of Moab many descents: for Mefha lived with Jehoram, and this Moabite in Zedekia's time, fourteen Kings of Juda coming between, who waited three hundred and odd years.

§. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

^{Gen. 50. Num. 1. 3. Jof. 13.} The Territory adjoining to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which joyned to the Mountains, was sometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as far to the South as Aroer. Of the children of Gad, the seventh son of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the Desarts, 45550. and of their sons there entered the Land promised, 45000. bearing Arms: for the half Tribe of Manasse, the River of Jaboc divided them: from Reuben, the Cities of Heshbon, Elhele, and Abbec.

^{Ezra 15. Deut. 1.} The chief City of Gad was Aroer, which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Junius attending diligently to those words of Moses, Deut. 2. 36. Ab Harobero, quæ est in ripa fluminis Arnon, & civitate ipsa qua est in flumine: Where the City in the River is distinguished from the City upon the bank of the River, as also in like manner, (Jof. 12. v. 2. and c. 13. 9.) thinketh that Harobero, which doublets belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32. 34. it is said that they built it) was indeed seated neer Har of the Moabites, but divers from it. For that Har was never posselt by Moses, it is plain Deuteronomy 2. 9. where God forbidding Moses to touch it, saith he hath given Har for an inheritance to the sons of Lot. Now that this City, which in divers places is said to be within, and in the middle of the River of Arnon (and so distinguished from Harobero, which is said in the same places to be on the bank of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Junius proveth out of Numbers, ch. 21. v. 15. where Arnon is said to be divided into divers streams, where or among which Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Jof. 13. ver. 25. where Harobero is said to be seated before Rabbah: which Rabbah, as it seems, cannot be the Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they seat not Harobero neer it, nor in sight of it) and therefore by Rabbah here, we must understand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Ar, or Har: and so we must needs distinguish it from Harobero. And as for Har, (which also gave the name to the coast adjoining) it seems it continued in the possession of the Moabites, after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims first weakened by Chedorlaomer and his Associates: but Harobero by the interchange of times suffered many ancient changes, as being won from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Israelites, and from them, as it seems in the story of Jephtha by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites again was recovered by the Israelites under the conduct of Jephtha.

^{S. Hierom's} time the greatest part of this City perished by an earth-quake, as also Zoar, in which Lot saved himself in the destruction of Sodom, seated not far hence; which, they say was therefore called Vitula confennans: quæ because as a wanton tumbling heifer, she was so often thrice overthrown with earth-quake: for which cause also Hierom seems to think that this Zoar was called Salissa, or Bal-Salissa, as if upon Baal had been a remainder of the old name Balah, or Belah, (of which Gen. 14. 2. and 3. 18. Salissa, which hath a signification of the ternary number, had alluded to the three earth-quake.

Brocard takes Harobero to be Petra, but the same erroneously, as before it is noted; seeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab adjoining to Edom, whereas Harobero is in the North-East border. Between Harobero and Jordan they seat Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, because they are said to have built it, Num. 32. 34. though Jof. 13. v. 17. it is said that Moses gave it to the Reubenites. Of this City among the rest of Moab, both Ezra and Hieremy prophesied, that it should perish, and the Lakes about it run with the blood of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village neer Arnon in S. Hierom's time.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next Cities of same to Aroer, was Bethnimrah, of which Ezra prophesied, That the war

^{hier. 48. Jof. 13. v. 17.} ters thereof should be dried up: and all the vale of Moab withered. Not far from Bethnimrah in this Tribe, Adrichomius placeth Jogbeha and Nobach, or Nobe: of both which we read in the story of Gideon: and that Jogbeha was in Gad, built by the Gadites, it appears, Numbers 32. 35. and therefore Nobach also must needs be in these parts; but whether in Gad or Manasse it is not certain: only that it was anciently called Kenath, Moses witnesseth. Nobach also (saith he) went and took Kenath with her Towns, and called it Nobach of his own name, where because the Verses precedent speak of the Manassites, and because it is not likely that Moses would have severed this seat of the Gadites from the rest, of which he spake before, ver. 34. 35. 36. therefore it may seem that this Nobach was in that part of Manasse which was in the East of Jordan, though Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas he supposeth it to be the same with Nob, which Saul destroyed, of this we shall speak (a) in the Tribe of Benjamin. And as for that Karkor, where Zebah and Zalmunnah rested themselves in their flight from Gideon, to which place Gideon marched through this Nobach and Jogbeha, though some place it in Gad, and make it the same with Kir-chares, of which Ezra 15. and 2 Reg. 3. 25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the same with Kir-chares, it is certain; that it was still a principal City held by the Moabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hataroth: of which name the Scripture witnesseth that two Cities were built by the Gadites; the former simply called Hataroth, the later Hataroth-Sophan: for which later the vulgar makes two Cities, Roth and Sophan: the name Hataroth, is as much as Corone.

In the Valley of the Kingdom of Sebon, together with Bethnimrah of which we have spoken, Jof. 13. 27. nameth Beth-baran and Succoth: the former, Numb. 32. 36. (where it is called Beth-baran) together with Bethnimrah, is said to have been built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather, because in Jof. 13. it is called Beth-baran) some take to be Betaramphib, of which (b) Josephus after by Herod called Julias. But whether this Betaramphib were corrupted from Beth-baran, or from Beth-Aramatha (of which Aramatha there is mention in (c) Josephus) or from Beth-Remphan (of which Remphan, an Idol of those Countries, we read, Act. 7. 43. and Isa. 46. 20. which Junius refers the name of the City Sophan, 1 Mac. 37.) of this question it were hard to resolve. But touching Julias (ac-

^{according to Josephus, sometime Bataramphib)} the same Josephus placeth in the Region of Perea, beyond Jordan, which Regio Perea, as the Greek word signifieth, is no more than Regio ultior, the Country beyond the River; and therefore they which labour to set down the bounds of this Perea, take more pains than needs. Fourteen Villages this Julias had belonging unto it, according to Josephus. He makes it to have been built by Herod Antipas, and named Julias, in honour of the adoption of Livia Augustus his wife, into the Julian Family: by which adoption she was called Julia. Another Julias, he saith was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Golanitis, which, he saith, is the same as Bethsaida.

Upon the Sea of Galilee, near to Julias in Perea, (that is, in the Region over Jordan) they find Vetezobra, which is called in Josephus, Beth-zobor, which is as much as domus bispsi. Of a noble woman of this City, which for safeguard in the time of War with the Romans, came with many others into Hierusalem, and was there besieged. Josephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable History; how for hunger she eat her own child, with other tragical accidents hereupon ensuing.

Of Succoth (which we said Jof. 13. is placed with Beth-baran, in the Valley of the Kingdom of Sebon) it is plain by the story of Gideon that it is near unto Jordan: where it is said, that as he was past Jordan with his three hundred, weary in the pursuit of Zebah and Zalmunnah, he requested relief of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gideons return were by him tortured, as it seems under a threshing-Car or Tribulum, between which and their flesh he put Thorns to tear their flesh as they were preft and trod under the Tribulum and after which sort also David used some of the Ammonites, though not with Thorns, but with iron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in haste, either for Men or Cattel, Moses, Gen. 33. 17. witnesseth that the original of the name was from such harbours, which Jacob in his return from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Rameses in Egypt, had their first Station, was upon like reason called Succoth: because there they set up their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they used after for forty years in the Wilderness. In remembrance whereof the Feast of Succoth, or Tabernacles, was instituted.

Num 22.
1. Chron.
27. 31.

Ezra 6. 8.
Nehem. 4. 8.

Other four Cities of Gad are named, Jofia 21. 28. Ramoth in Gilead, Macbanaim, Cheshbon, and Jahzer, all of them by the Gadites given to the Levites, of which Jahzer, as Cheshbon, or Heshbon was a chief City of Sehon, whence Num. 32. 1. his Country is called the Land of Jahzer. It was taken by Moses, having first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilead. In latter times (as it may be gathered by the Prophecy of Efay touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites: to which place of Efay, also Hieremy in a like prophecy alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seems from the Ammonites) by Judas Macchabeus: as it is 1 Mac. 5. 8. where Junius out of Josephus, reads, Jahzer, though the Greek hath Gazer. For Gazer, or Gezer (as he gathereth out of Jos. 16. 3. and 8. and Jud. 1. 29.) was far from these Countries of Sehon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, until Solomon's time, for whom the King of Egypt wan it from the Canaanites, and gave it him as a Dowry with his Daughter.

Of Cheshbon it may be marvelled that in the place of Jofia, and 1 Chron. 6. 81. it should be said to have been given to the Levites by the Gadites, (seeing Jos. 13. 17. it is reckoned for a principal City of the Reubenites: Adrichomius, and such as little trouble themselves with such scruples, finding Cheshbon, 1 Mac. 5. 26. among the Cities of Gilead, taken by Judas Macchabeus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Cheshbon had been the Cheshbon of Gad, and that of Reuben distinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, That it being a bordering City, between Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gave their part to the Levites, for so also it seems that in like reason Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another given to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Macbanaim, which word signifieth a double Army, we read Gen. 22. 2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angels of God in that place met Jacob in manner of another Host or company, to join with his for his defence: as also Luke 2. 13. we read of a multitude of the Host of Heaven, which appeared to the Shepherds, at the time of our Saviours birth: and so unto the godly King Ofwald of Northumberland, when he was loon after to join battle with the Pagan Penda of middle-England, Seda reports, that the like comfort appeared: whence the field where the Battle was fought, in the North parts of England, is called Heaven-field. In this City of Macbanaim, David abode during the rebellion of Abshalom: and the same, for the strength thereof, Abner chose for the seat of Ishbooth, during the war between David and the house of Saul.

Of the fourth Town, which was Ramoth in Gilead, we read often in the Scripture, for the recovering of which, King Achab lost his life. Junius thinks that Ramatha Mitspa, of which Jos. 13. 26. was this Ramoth in Gilead. Concerning the place where Laban and Jacob swore one to the other, as it was called Gilead, which is as much as a witnessing heap, because of the heap of stones which Laban and his sons left for a monument; so also that it was called Mitspab, which signifieth over-looking (because there they called God to over-see, and be witness to their Covenant) it is plain by the place, Gen. 31. 49. That in these parts there was not onely a Town, but likewise a Region called Mitspa, it appears Jos. 11. 3. where we read of the Chivites under Hermion, in the Country of Mitspa, * the Town of Mitspa, as it seems both by this place, and in the eighth verse following, being not in the Hill Country, but in the Valley. But seeing that Jephtha the Judge of Israel, who after he came home from Tob (whither his brethren had driven him) dwelt in the Town of Mitspa, who doubtless was of the Tribe of Manasse, and thence at first expelled by his brethren, it may seem that they do not well, which place this Town of Mitspa rather in Gad than in Manasse. By Judas Macchabeus this Town of Mitspa (whether in Gad or in Manasse) was utterly spoiled and burnt, and the Males of it slain: for it was then posselt of the Ammonites.

Between Succoth (of which we have spoken) and the River Jaboc, was that Peniel, or Pennel, which name signifieth Locus facie Dei; A place where the face of God was seen: so called for memory of the Angels appearing to Jacob, and wrestling with him there: the churlishness of which City, in refusing to relieve Gideon, was the cause that in his return he overthrew their Tower, and slew the chief Aldermen thereof. To these places of the Gadites, they add Regelim, the City of that great and faithful subject Barzillai, as it seems, not far from Nabandaima, where he sustained King David, during Abshalom's rebellion. To these they add the Town of Gadai, Arnon, and Alimis, of vvhich Gadai, being in Hebrew no more than Gaddita, is ignorantly made the name of a place. Arnon also no where appears to be the name of a Town, but still of a River. Alimis Adrichomius frames of Ἀλμυς, 1 Mac. 5. 26. so that the name should rather be Alama, but Junius out of Josephus reads Malle, for this in Alimis: and

and understanding Malle to be put for Millo, and to be as much as Munitio (as we have shewed touching the Millo of the Sechemites) he takes this Malle to be Mitspa Moabitum, of which 1 Sam. 22. 3. As for that Mageb which Adrichomius finds in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Mabacath, which Moses notes to be as far as the furthest of Manasse, out of the bounds of this Tribe. So also Dathema, of which 1 Mac. 5. 10. (which Junius takes to be (b) Rishma, of which Num. 33. 18. a place of strength in the Territory of the Ammonites) and in like manner Adinith, and Abel vincarum, though by some they be attributed to the Gadites, or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two last we read in Septua's pursuit of the Ammonites 1 seated, as it seems by that place of the Book of Judges, the former of them in the South border, and the other of them in the East border, both far removed from the Gadites. But the chief City of the Ammonites was nearer, and not far from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometimes Rabbath, as Deut. 3. 11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to be that * Philadelphia which Ptolomy finds in Celestria, Hierome and Caliste, in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but, as it seems, never posselt by the Israelites, after the overthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites: whereupon at length it became the Regal seat of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzummims: which is as much to say, as men for all manner of craft and wickedness infamous. The same were also called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recovered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his Ancestors: who having been first beaten by the Affryans, and their assistants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Seir had been) were afterwards the easier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims by the Idumeans. Yet did the races of Emoreus, of whom these Giants were descended, contend with the Conquerors for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Herbon had disposelt Moab, so had Og of Babylon the Ammonites, and between them recovered the best part of all the Valley, between the Mountains and Jordan. For this Og was also master of Rabba, or Philadelpia: And in the possession of the one or of the other of these two Moses and Israel, found all those Cities and Countries, which were given to Reuben, Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasse. So that though it were 450. years since that these Zamzummims, or Raphaim, were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but having these two Kings of one kined, and both valiant and undertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon, both Amorites, they recovered again much of their lost possessions, and thrust the sons of Lot over the Mountains, and into the Deserts. And as the Kings or Captains of Periss and Affrya (remembered in the 14. of Genesis) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom; so by that great conquest which Moses had over those two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take opportunity to look back again into those Plains; and when the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, forsook the worship of the living God, and became sloathful and licentious; they taking the advantage, invaded them, and cast them out of their possessions: and were sometime their Masters, sometime their Tributaries, as they pleased or displeased God: and according to the wisdom and virtue of their Commanders.

In this City of Rabba, was the iron bed of Og found, nine cubits of length, and four of breadth. The City was taken in David's time, and the Inhabitants slain with great severity, and by divers torments. At the first assault thereof Urias was shot to death, having been by direction from David, appointed to be employed in the leading of an assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Army perished: and wherein David lo displeased God; as his affairs had ill success afterward, even to his dying day. From hence had David the weighty and rich Crown of Gold, which the Kings of Ammon wore: or which, as some expound it, was used to be put on the head of their Idol, weighing a talent, which is 60. pound weight, after the common talent. In the time of Christians it had a Metropolitan Bishop, and under him twelve others.

The mountains which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a part of Reuben, are those that Ptolomy calleth the hills of Hippur, a City of Celestria: and Strabon, * Trachones: the same which continue from near Damascus, unto the Deserts of Moab: and receive divers names, as common to Mountains do, which neighbour and bound divers Countries: for from the South part, as far Northwards as Asteroth, the chief City of Og, they are called Galaad, or Gilead; from thence Northward they are known by the name of Hermion, for so Mose calleth them: The Sidonians name them Shirion, but the Amorites, Shenir, others, Seir: of which name all those hills are were called, which part Judea and Idumea: and lastly, they are called Libanus, Hierram Libanus, for so the Prophet Hieremy makes them all one, calling the high Mountains of Galaad the head of Libanus.

Min. 8. 9. These Mountains are very fruitful, and full of good pastures, and have many Trees which yield Balsamm, and many other medicinal drugs. The Rivers of this Tribe are the waters of Nimrah, and Dibon, and the River Jaboc: others do also fancy another River, which rising out of the Rocks of Arnon, falleth into Jordan.

§. VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whose Territories the Gadites were from Og, the King of Basan.

Jud. 10. This Tribe of Gad posselt half the Country of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petraea called Nabatheea, as well within as without the Mountains of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites wan it, it was in the possession of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Moses did not expell the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thrust the issues of Lot over the Mountains Trachones, or Gilead, as before. After the death of Othniel the first Judge of Israel, the Ammonites joyned with the Moabites against the Hebrews, and so continued long. Jephtha Judge of Israel had a great conquest over one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they were at peace with them again.

1 Sam. 11. Afterward we find that cruel King of the Ammonites, called Nabaz, who besieging Jabes Gilead, gave them no other conditions but the pulling out of their right eyes. The reason why he tendered to hard a composition, was (besides this desire to bring shame upon Israel) because those Gileadites using to carry a Target on their left arms, which could not but shadow their left eyes, should by losing their right, be utterly disabled to defend themselves: but Saul came to their rescue, and delivered them from that danger. This Nabaz, as it may seem, became the confederate of David, having friended him in Saul's time, though Jephthas thinks that this Nabaz was slain in the battel, when Saul raised the siege of Jabes, who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name.

Hannu succeeded Nabaz: to whom when David sent to congratulate his establishment, and to confirm the former friendship which he had with his father, he most contemptuously and proudly cut off the Ambassadors garments to the knees, and shaved the half of their beards. But afterward, notwithstanding the aids received from the Aramites, subject to Adadazer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maacah, and from Iffob, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were overturned: their chief City of Rabba, after Philadelphus, was taken; the Crown which weighed a talent of gold, was set on David's head; all such as were prisoners, David executed with strange severity; for with saws and harrows he tare them in pieces, and cast the rest into lime-kills. Josaphat governing Juda, they assisted the Moabites their neighbours against him, and perished together. Osias made them Tributaries, and they were again by Jotham enforced to continue that tribute, and to increase it to wit, a hundred talents of silver, ten thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley: which the Ammonites continued two years.

The fifth King of the Ammonites, of whose name we read, was Baalhis the confederate of Zedekia: after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Baalhis sent Ismael, of the blood of the Kings of Juda, to slay Gedaliah, who served Nabuchodonosor.

§. VII.

Of the other half of Manasse.

1 Macc. 11. The rest of the Land of Gilead, and of the Kingdom of Og in Basan, with the land of Hur and Argob, or Trachonitis (wherein also were part of the small Territories of Batania, Gaulonitis, Gessuri, Macchati, and Auranitis) was given to the half Tribe of Manasse over Jordan; of which those three later Provinces defended themselves against the Jews for many ages. But Batania Ptolomy country of seteth farther off, and to the North-East, as is a skirt of Arabia the Desert: and all those other Provinces before named with Petraea, and Iturea, he nameth but as part of Calassyria; as far South as Rabba, or Philadelphia: the like likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad, of Sehon and Reuben, having the Land near the Dead Sea, he makes a part of Arabia Petraea: for as many of these small Kingdoms take not a name much more ground than the country of Reuben, Basan, or, after the Septuagint, Basaniis: of which stretcheth itself from the River of Jaboc to the (a) Macchati and Gessuri: and from the Mountains to Jordan, a Region exceeding this fertile; by reason whereof it abounded in all sorts of Cattell. It had also the goodliest woods of all that part of the world: especially of oaks, which bare mast (of which the Prophet Zacharias; Howle, O ye oaks of Basan) and by reason hereof they bred so many swine, as (b) 2000. in one herd were carried headlong into the Sea, by the unclean spirits which Chabbi had cast out of one of the Gadarens. It chadd in it 60. Cities walled and defended: all which, after Og and his sons were slain, Jair, descended of Manasse, conquered, and called the Country after his own name, Avotib Jair, or the Cities of Jair.

Prophet

The principal Cities of this half Tribe (for I will omit the rest) are these, Pella, sometimes (c) Butte, otherwise Berenice; by Seleucus King of Syria, it is said to have been called Pella, after the name of that Pellin Macedon: In which both Philip the Father, and his Son, Alexander the great, were born. It was taken, and in part demolished by Alexander Jannæus, King of the Jews, because it refused to obey the Jews laws: but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Government of Syria. It is now but a Village, faith Niger. Carnaim, by the River of Jaboc, taken by (d) Judas Maccabæus: where he set on fire the (e) Temple of their Idols: together with all those that fled thereunto for Sanctuary; and neer it they place the Castle of Carnion, of which a Macc. 12. 22. Then the strong City of (f) Ephron neer Jordan: which refusing to yeild passage to (g) Judas Maccabæus, was forced by him by assault, and taken and burnt with great slaughter.

Jabes Gilead, or Jabesur, was another of the Cities of this half Tribe, which being besieged by Nabaz (h) King of the Ammonites, was delivered by Saul, as is (i) elsewhere mentioned. In memory whereof these Citizens (k) recovered, embalmed and buried the bodies of Saul and his sons: which hung despitfully over the walls of Bethsan, or Scythopolis. (l) Gaddara, or Gadara, is next to be named, seated by Pliny on a Hill neer the River Hieromace, which River Orielus seems to think to be Jaboc. At the foot of the Hill there spring forth also hot baths, as at Macchæus. Alexander Jannæus after ten months siege, wan it, and subverted it. Pompey restored it: and Gabinus (m) made it one of the five Courts of Justice in Palestine. Hierusalem being the first, Gadara the second, Emath, or Amathus the third, Hierico and Scaphra in Galilee, the fourth and fifth. The Citizens impatiently bearing the tyranny of Herod, surnamed Ascalonitis, accused him to Julius Cæsar of many crimes: but perceiving that they could not prevail, and that Herod was highly favoured of Cæsar, fearing the terrible (n) revenge of Herod, they slew themselves: some by strangling, others by drowning themselves.

To the East of Gadara they place Sebei (o) in which, Jos. ant. 5. 13. faith, Jephtha was buried: whence others reading with the Vulgar, Jud. 12. 7. Septulius off in Civitate Jephthæ Gilead, (for in una Civitate Gilead) imagine Gilead to be the name of a City, and to be the same with Sebei. In like manner following the Vulgar, a Macc. 5. 26. where it readeth Casphor for Chesbon; the same Adrichomius imagineth it to be ampla & firma Gileaditarum Civitas: so of one City Herbon, or Chesbon, which they call Efsebon, the chief City of Sekon, in the Tribe of Reuben, he imagineth two more: This Casphor in Manasse, and a City in Gad which he calleth Casbon, of which we have admittid the Reader heretofore. Of Gamala (so called, because the Hill on which it stood, was in fashion like the back of a Cammel) which Jephthas placeth not far from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis over against Tarichea, which is on the West side of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias, see this Josaphus in the fourth book of the Jewish war: where he describes the place by nature to be almost invincible: and in the story of the siege, shewes how Vespasian with much danger of his own person, entering it, was at first repulld, with other very memorable accidents: and how at length, after the coming of Titus when it was taken, many leaping down the rocks with their wives and children, to the number of five thousand, thus perished: besides four thousand slain by the Romans: so that none escaped, save only two women that hid themselves.

About four miles West from Gadara, and as much East from Tiberias (which is on the other side of the Lake) Josaphus placeth Hippus, or Hippene, whence Ptolomy gives the names to the Hills that compass the Plains in which it standeth: so that it may seem to have been of no small note. It is feared far from the hill Country: on the East of the Lake, as also Pliny noteth, lib. 5. cap. 15. It was restored by Pompey: after by Augustus added to Herod's Terrarchy: it was waited by the Jews, in the beginning of their rebellion: when by many massacres of their Nation, they were enraged against their borders.

The next City of note, but of more ancient fame, is Edrebi, or Edrai, wherein Og King of Basan chiefly abode, when Asa and Israel invaded him: and neer unto this his Regal City, it was that he lost the battel and his life. It stood in S. Hierom's time: and had the name of Adar, or Adura. Not far from these Towns neer Jordan, in this Valley, stood Gersafa, or Gergessa, inhabited by the

the Gergesites, descended of the fifth son of Canaan. Of these Gergesites we read, Matt. 8. 28. that Christ coming from the other side of the Lake of Tiberias, landed in their coasts: where casting the Devils out of the possessed, he permitted them to enter into the herd of Hogs: in which story, for Gergesites, or Gergesins, S. Luke and S. Marke have Gaderens: not as if these were all one (for Gergesit, or Gerasa is a distinct Town in these parts from Gadara) but the bounds being confounded, and the Cities neighbours, either might well be named in this story. This City received many changes and calamities: of which Josephus hath often mention. For besides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annius, Lieutenant to Vespasian: and 1000. of the ablest young men put to the sword, and the City burnt. In the year 1120. it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damascus: and in the same year recovered by Baldwine de Burgo King of Jerusalem: and by him utterly razed. Near unto Gerasa is the Village of Magedan, or, after the Syriack, Magedu, or, after the Greek, Magdala, where the Pharisees and Sadducees desired of our Saviour a sign from Heaven: the same place, or some adjoining to it, which S. Mark calleth Dalmanutha. By the circumstances of which story it appears that this coast lay between the Lake of Tiberias and the Country of Decapolis. Brocard makes both these places to be one; and finds it to be Phiale, the fountain of Jordan, according to Josephus: but this Phiale is too far from the Sea of Gallilee, and from Bethsaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmanutha. For as it appears by the story, not far hence, towards the North, was the Desart of Bethsaida, where Christ filled 5000. people with the five barley loaves and two fishes.

On the North of this Bethsaida, they place Julias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was sometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Christ, it was compassed with a wall by Philip the Tetrach of Iturea and Trachonitis: and after the name of Julia, the wife of Tiberias, called Julias, as hath been further spoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Josephus makes this Julias to be the same as Bethsaida. Upon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberias stands Corozaim, or Corazin, of which Christ in Matthew, Woe be unto thee Corazin.

But the principal City of all these in ancient time was Asteroth: sometime peopled with the Giantes Raphaim: and therefore the Country adjoining called the Land of Giantes, of whose race was Og King of Basan. In Genesis this City is called Asteroth of Carnaim, whence 1. Mat. 5. 26. it is called simply Carnaim, as Job. 13. 21. it is called Asteroth, without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim signifieth a pair of Horns, which agree well with the name of their Idol Asteroth, which was the image of a sheep, as it is elsewhere noted, that Asteroth in Dentonomy signifieth sheep. Others, from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Carnaim to have been the name of the people which inhabited this City: and expound it heroes * radianter. For of old the Raphei which inhabited this City (Gen. 14. 5) were Giant-like men, as appears by comparing the words Deut. 3. 11. Og rex residuo gigantum, with the words Job. 13. 21. Og ex reliquis Raphaeorum: but if the Carnaim (or Carnajim) were these Raphei, the word would not have been in the dual number: neither would Moses in the places of Genesis have said the Raphei in Asteroth of the Carnaim, but either the Raphei in Asteroth of the Raphei, or some other way fittest for periphrasis: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth one from the other.

Not far from Asteroth, Adicromis out of Brocard and Breidenbach placeth Cedar in the way out of Syria into Galilee, four miles from Corazin. This City (saith he) is remembered in the Canticles, and in the book of Judith, and there are that of this City understand David in his 120. Psalms: and here the Sepulchre of Job is yet to be seen, saith Breidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is so that the Greek hath Galaad in stead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth use in that place of Judith, and joyneth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Psalms do rather prove that Cedar was not hereabout, than any way help Adicromis. For that they speak of Scenita Cedarum, it is apparent, and as evident by the place in the Canticles, that they were de colores, much more than any under the Climates of the Land of Canaan: whence Junius out of Lampridius and Pliny placeth them in Arabia Petraea, far from these parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Job, it is certain that the Arabians and Saracens (holding those places) have many things to abuse the Christians, and to get money. Further, it may well be affirmed, that many (if not all) the historical circumstances of Job are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his Country seek to get some knowledge of him, than by his presumptions founded upon him, infer what his Country was, and build unto him a City by conjecture.

Of Job himself, whether he was the same Jobab remembered in the 26. of Genesis, descended from Esau King also of Idumea, though Rupertus, Lyranus, Oleagere, and Bellarmino are of another opinion, yet Saint Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregorie, with Atanasius, Hippolytus, Irenaeus, Eusebius Emisenus, Apollinaris, Eusebius, and other cited by S. Hierome in his 126. Epist. to Evagrius, take him for the same.

The Land of Hus or Haw, wherein Hus dwelt, is from the Greek ov, which the Septuagint use for the word Hus, translated by the Vulgar sometimes Hus, as Job. 1. 1. sometime Asthis, as Hierem. 25. 20. This Land is placed by Junius between Palestine and Callosyria, besides Chamaeth (or Hamatha) under Palmyrene, in the Country called by Plolomy Trachonitis, or Bathanea, the bounds of which Countries are confounded with Basan in this half Tribe of Manasse. And that this Land of Hus was thus seated, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Jer. 25. 20. where he reckons the Hittites among the promiscuous borders of the Israelites, whom he therefore calleth promiscuous, or miscelaneous, Arabam, because their bounds were not only joyned but confounded, and their Seigniories mingled one with the other: but of this place the words of Hieremy, Lam. 4. 21. speaking of the same Prophecy, of which he speaketh in the 25. Chapter, must needs be expounded, as Junius reads them, distinguishing the Land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edomi, O que habitas in terra Hus; O daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the Land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguish, but readeth, Filia Edom que habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwellest in the land of Hus: Hence, as it seems, some of the learned have thought that Job was an Edomite, as we have said, and King of Edom, which if they understand by Idumea, or Edom, so called in Moses time, they are greatly mistaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Idumea. For it is very probable that Espan, when he first parted from Jacob, did not seat himself in Edom, or Seir, which lieth on the South border of Judea, but inhabited seir far to the East of Jordan, on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both very and held part of those Mountains, otherwise called Galaad, and Hermom, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites, Shenir, for Seir; and from this his habitation did Espan encounter Jacob, when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who passed by the very border of Espan his abiding. It is true, that at such time as Moses wandered, and returned, of whom Gen. 25. 2. perhaps, in the Desarts, that the posterity of Espan inhabited seir to the South of Judea: for it is like that the Amorites, who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did also drive the Edomites out of those parts, who thenceforward seated themselves to the South of Judea, bordering the Desart Paran, and stretched their habitations over the Deserts as far as Hor where Aaron died.

Now for this Hus, which gave the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the son of Aram, as Junius thinks in his note upon Gen. 10. 23. or rather Hus the son of Nachor, Abrahams brother, the question is doubtful. For my part I rather incline to think, that it was Hus the son of Nachor: partly because these Families of Aram seem long before to have been loft and partly because in Job. 31. 2. Elihu the fourth of Job's friends, which seems to be of Job's own Country, is called a Euzite, of Buz the brother of Hus, the son of Nachor: as also Jer. 25. 25. in the same continuation (though some other Nations named between) where Hus is spoken of, there Buz is also named. Neither doth it hinder our conjecture, that in the place of Job. 32. Elihu the Euzite is said to be of the Family of Ram: (which Junius expounds to be as much as of the Family of Aram) for that by his Aram we are not to understand Aram the son of Sem, Junius himself maketh it plain, both in his annotation upon the beginning of his book, where he saith, that one of Job's friends (which must needs be this Elihu) was of the posterity of Nachor (as also in this place he confesseth so much expressly) and in as much as he readeth not Familia Aram, or Ram, but Familia Syriac; like as elsewhere Laban, who sprung of Nachor, is called a Syrian.

As for the other three of Job's friends (of whom by this note of Elihu his being of the Syrian Family, or of the Family of Nachor it is implied that they were of other kindreds, as also by the Septuagint's addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hus, or Asthis, it is implied that they thought only Elihu to have been of Job's own Country.

Franciscus Brocard the Atank, in his description of the Holy Land in the journey from Acon Eastward, findeth Sneha, and Theman on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both very near to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may seem to have denominated Beldad the Shuchite; the other Elihu the Themanite: two of the three friends of Job, of which Job. 7. 11. But Junius thinks that the Shuchites were inhabitants of Arabia the Desart, descended of Shuch the son of Abraham and Rebecca; of whom Gen. 25. 2. perhaps, in the Desarts, that the posterity of Espan inhabited seir to the South of Judea: for it is

R R Elihu.

Elipbaz was, to have been of Arabia the Desert: and Elipbaz himself to have been of the posterity of Theman the son of Elipbaz, which was the son of Esaú. And so also Nabamah, whence Tophar the third of Job's friends (which in this place of Job. 2. 11. are mentioned) is by the same learned Expofitor, thought either to be named of Thimnah by transposition of letters (which Thimnah, Gen. 36. 40. is named among the sons of Esaú, that gave denomination to the places where they were seated) or else to be the same Nabamah, which Jos. 15. 41. is reckoned for a City of Juda in the border, as he thinks, of Edom. And yet I deny not but that near the Land of Hur, in Basan, as it seems, in the Tribe of Manasse, there is a Region which (at least) in later times was called Smith, or of some like name. For this is evident by the History of Will. Tyrinus, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Suita, or Suites (as he calls it diversely) of exceeding great strength and use for the retaining of the whole Country: which, in the time of Baldwine the second King of Hierusalem, was with great digging through rocks recovered by the Christians; having not long before been lost, to the great disadvantage of the Country, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The situation of this Fort is by Tyrinus described to be sixteen miles from the City Tiberias, on the East of Jordan: by Adrichomius four miles Northward from the place where Jordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

Other Cities of this part of Manasse named in the Scripture, are these: Golan, Gobethera, Mitpa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the coming of the Israelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitpa of Gilead, we have spoken by occasion among the Cities of Gad. The other two were given to the Levites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan we have both Gaulanitis superior and inferior, oft in Josephus. Bebethibera is accounted the chief City of Basan by some, but the Writers corrupting the name into Bosra, it is confounded with Besfor, or Bosra of Reuben, and with Bosra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierome hath Arga, a name of a City placed by some about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Josephus) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Josephus calls it. This Lake, being as it were in the midst between Cesarea Philippi and Tiberias, through which, as through the Lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this half Tribe on the West. When the snow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, saith Brochard: otherwise more contract, leaving the marshy ground on both sides, for Lions and other wilde beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plentifully grow there.

Adjoining to this Lake in this Country of Manasse, Josephus names two places of strength, fortified by himself in the beginning of the Jews rebellion: Selenia the one, and Sogane the other. In the North side of this half Tribe of Manasse, and in the North-East, the Scripture nameth divers bordering places towards Damascus, as Tsedad, Chawram, and Chasfar-Henan, lying in a line drawn from the West; of which three Cities we read, Ezek. 47. 15. with which also agrees the place, Nun. 34. 8. where for Chawram between Tsedad, and Chasfar-Henan, Zipbron is named. From this Chawram is the name of Auranitis Regio, in Josephus and Tyrinus, whose bounds (as also the bounds of Gessur and Mabacath, or Macati, which were likewise borderers to Manasse towards the North-East) are unknown: only that Gessur was of might, it appears in that David married Mahaca the daughter of Thalmay King of Gessur: by whom he had the most beautiful, but wicked and unfortunate Abshalom.

CHAP. XI.

The History of the Syrians, the chief Borderers of the Israelites that dwell on the East of Jordan.

§. I.

Of the City of Damascus, and the divers Fortunes thereof.

DAMASCUS of all other in this border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in beauty, antiquity, and riches, and was therefore called the City of joy and gladness, and the House of pleasure; and is not only remembered in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrews, saith Josephus, think it to have been built by Hur the son of Aram: of which opinion S. Hierome upon Egy seemeth to be; though in his Hebrew questions he affirmeth, that it was founded by Damascus the son of

of Eltezer, Abraham's Steward; a thing very unlikely, seeing the City was formerly known by that name, as appears by Abraham's calling this his Steward Eltezer of Damascus. David was the first that subjected it to the Kingdom of Juda, after the overthrow of Adadzer their King; but in Solomon's time, Rezon recovered it again, though he had no title at all or right to that Principality: but David having overthrown Hadadzer King of Sophena (otherwise Syria Soba, or Zoba) Razon or Rezon, with the remainder of that broken Army, invaded Damascus, and possessed Damascus itself, and became an enemy to Solomon all his life.

The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from David and Joab, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of Egypt's Wives sister: of whom Taphnes in Egypt was so called. This Adad returning again, became an enemy to Solomon all his life, and (as some Writers affirm) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence out. In the Line of Adad that Kingdom continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the Catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assyrians, and then the Grecians succeeded. This City was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the Rivers of Abanah, and Phanpar: whereof one of them, prophane Writers call it for Adonik. The Country adjoining is very fruitful of excellent Wines and Wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle, built as it seems by the Florentines, after it became Christian: the Lillies being found cut in many Marbles in that Citadel. Against this City the Prophets Amos, Ejy, Jeremy, and Zacharias, prophesied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heap of stones. In the time of the last Rezon, and tenth King of the Damascens, Teglatphalaser, invited by Achaz King of Juda, carried away the naturals of Damascus into the East: leaving of his own Nation to inhabit it. After that it was utterly ruined by the Babylonians, saith Hierome upon Ejy: which thing was performed by Salmanasser, according to Junius in his note upon that place, five years after the Prophecy. In time it was restored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies; but long after, when

Syria fell into the hands of the Romanes, it was taken by Metellus, and Lollius. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop: Saint Hierome living, as he affirmeth upon the Aur, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens: being taken by Elamer their King from the Romanes, in the year of our redemption 636. and in the year 1147, Conrad the third, Emperor of Rome, Lewy King of France, Bald in Clare, Duke of Austria, brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbarossa afterward Emperor, Theodorick Earl of Flanders, and other Princes assembled at Pirolomai Acon, on the sea-coast, determined to recover Damascus: but being betrayed by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprize.

In the year 1262, Hahon the Tartar invader, and having formerly taken the King, brought him under the Walls, and threatened extreme torture unto him, except the Citizens rendred the place: but they refusing it, the King was torn asunder before them, and in fine the City taken, Agab the son of Hahon was by his father made King thereof.

In the year 1400, Tamberlain Emperor of the Partians, invaded that Region, and besieged the City with an Army of 1200000. (if the number be not mistaken.) He entered it, and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners; those that retired into the Castle, which seemed a place impregnable, he overtopped with another Castle adjoining: he forbore the demolishing of the City, in respect of the beauty of the Church, garnished with forty Gates, or sumptuous Porches. It had within it 9000. Lanterns of Gold and Silver: but while he invaded Egypt, they again surprized Damascus. Lastly, in his return after three months siege, he foretold it: the Mahometans profstrating themselves with their Priests, desiring mercy. But Tamberlain commanding them to enter the Church, he burnt them and it to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their houses, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Trophée of his victory, he raised three Towers with great art, builded with the heads of those whom he had slaughtered: After this, it was restored and re-polished by the Soldane of Egypt with a Garrison of Mamlukes: And in the year 1517, Selimus Emperor of the Turks wrested it out of the hands of the Egyptians: in whose possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mahometans and Christians of all neighbouring Nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power.

NOW be it that Damascus were founded by Hur the son of Aram, or by Damascus

the son of Eliezer Abraham's steward, we find no relation of their Kings, or Commonwealth till David's time. For it stood without the bounds of Canaan: and therefore neglected by Moses, Josiah, and the Judges, as impertinent to that Story. But were it to that it had some Reguli, or petty Kings over it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing. All such time as David overthrew Adadexer Prince of Sophena, or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Phny calleth Nubai, inhabiting between Batania and Emphrates. Now the better to understand the story of those Syrian Princes, whom soon after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the Reader may inform himself, That on the North-East parts of the Holy Land, there were three chief Principallities; whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Commonwealth of Israel, namely; Damascus, or Aram, Sophena, or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath Zoba; of which these were the Princes in David's and Solomon's times: Razon, or Rezon of Damascus; Ben-adad, El-adad of Syria, Zoba, and Tobu of Chamath. But it seemeth, that Damascus was one of the Cities subject to Adadexer when David invaded him, though when Saul made war against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Josephus affirmeth, the leader of those succours, which were levied and sent to Hadad-Rezer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battle slain with 22000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the overthrow of Adadexer, Rezon the Commander of his Army, taking advantage, made himself King of Damascus, Adadexer, and Adad of Damascus being both slain. About the same time 1 King 11 Tobu King of Chamath, or Iurea, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adadexer was utterly overthrown, sendeth for peace to David, and presenteth him with rich gifts: but in dolo, faith S. Hierome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Judeans and Israelites. But to return to the Kings of Syria, I mean of Syria as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath, or Iurea; to which I may add Geshur, because it is so accounted in the second of Sam. 15. as joining in the Territory to Damascus (for Syria at large is far greater, of which Palestina itself is but a Province, as I have noted in the beginning of this Tract:) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later Writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, others Adad of Idumea: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that David having invaded that Region, and left Joab there to destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the Kings seed fled into Egypt; and was there married to Taphner the Queen's sister, as before; who hearing of David's death, and of the death of his Captain Joab (whom indeed all the bordering Nations feared) he turned again: and, as Beniting thinketh, this Adad did expel Rezon out of Damascus, and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To me it seemeth otherwise. For, as I take it, Adadexer, the son of Rebo, whom Saul invaded, was the Founder of that Principality: and the first of Adads, who forsaking his fathers name, as he grew powerful, took upon him the stile of Adad, the great god of the Assyrians; faith Macrobius, which signified Oneness of Unity. I also find a City called Adada, in the same part of Syria: of which whether these Princes took the name, or gave it, I am ignorant. For Adadexer, Ben-adad, El-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and El adjoined. And that Adadexer was of greatest power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, that David undertook the war: Secondly, because he levied 22000. Aramites out of the Territory of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascens had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would have given us his name: Thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adadexer was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained of Arabia Petrea as far as to Emphrates, according to Phny: and the greatest part of Arabia Petrea, according to Niger. Whosoever was the first, whether Adadexer, or Adad of Idumea, Rezon was the second: Who was an enemy to Israel all the days of Solomon. Besides the evil that Adad did, the evil that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumea, lately returned out of Egypt: to wit, 23. years after he was carried thither.

The third King of Damascus, and of Zobab both, was Hexion; to Hexion succeeded Tabremmon, or Tabrimmon; to him Benhadad, as is proved in the first of Kings: For Asa 15. 18. King of Juda the son of Abiam, the son of Boam, the son of Solomon, being vexed and invaded by Bascha, the successor of Nadab, the son of Jersboam, sent to Benhadad the son of Tabrimmon, the son of Hexion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to invade Israel (while Bascha sought to fortify Rama against Asa: thereby to block him up, that he should not enter into any of the territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Asa, having received his presents, willingly invaded the Country of Nephthalim, and took divers Cities, and spoils thence: Asa in the mean while carrying away all the Materials, which Bascha had brought to fortify Rama withal, and converted them to his own use.

This Benhadad's Father Tabremmon was in league with Asa: and so was his Father Hexion: for Asa requirith the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his son: though it seemeth that the gold and silver sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon invaded Israel, before the enterprise of his son Benhadad, is conjectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth: The Cities which my father took from my father, I will restore, and thou shalt make freets or Keepers of the borders: for thee in Damascus: as my Father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it self were of much importance) because Tabremmon was father indeed to Benhadad which invaded Bascha, at the request of Asa: But this Benhadad that twice entered upon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the son of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Asa and Abiam, as before, than the son of Tabremmon. For between the invasion of Benhadad the first, in Bascha's time, and the siege of Samaria, and the overthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49. years, as may be gathered out of the reigns of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. years of age to Benhadad, when he invaded Bascha, and after that 49. years ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one, it is unlikely that Benhadad at such an age should make war. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pomp; but the second Benhadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolve, that Benhadad the son of Tabremmon invaded Bascha and Omr; and Benhadad the second invaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad received two notorious overthrows: the first

1 King 10. at Samaria, by a fall of 700. Israelites: the second at Aphec, where, with the like number in effect, the Israelites slaughtered 20000. of the Aramites; besides 27000. which were crush't by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab again seth at liberty: to whom he rendreth those Towns that his father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refused to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier Town, and of great importance. Now three years after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being delivered, Achab invaded Gilead, and besieged the City, being assisted by Josaphat. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded, and dieth that night. After this, Benhadad sendeth the Commander of his forces, called Naaman, to Joram the son of Achab to be healed of the leprosy, and though Elizeus had healed him, yet he picked a quarrell against Joram: and when Joram, by Elizeus his intelligence had escaped his plot, he sent men and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is aforesaid. After Benhadad besieged Samaria again, and being terrified thence from Heaven, he departed home, and sickness, and sendeth Azael with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his estate if he might live. Azael returning, smothereth him. Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benhadad Adar, and the son of Adar: Amos and Hieremy mention the Towers of Benhadad. Josephus writeth that Benhadad and his succellour Azael were worshipped for Gods by the Syrians: to his time, for the sumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, faith he, that scarce yet 1100. years are complete since their wars with the Israelites.

Hazeel or Azael, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was appointed by Elilja, or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Benhadad should recover his present sickness: He waged war with Joram, who received divers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Jesreel, he and the King of Juda, Ahaziah or Ochozias, are slain by Jehu, as before is said. After the death of Joram, Azael continued war against Jehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse over Jordan. He then invaded Juda, and took Gath; but by gifts from Josiah he was averted from attempting Hierusalem: for he professed him all the bellowed things which Josaphat, Jehoram, and Ahaziah his fathers, Kings of Juda, had dedicated, and which he himself had dedicated; and all the gold which was found in the treasures of the Lord, and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoiled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Asa did present Benhadad with those treasures, when he invited him to war upon Bascha King of Israel. And notwithstanding this compulsion between Josiah and Azael, yet a part of his Army spoiled the other Provinces of Judea, and slaughtered many principal persons. Lastly, Azael Azazel vexed Joabaz the son of Jehu, and brought him to that extremity, as he left him but fifty Horse-men, ten Chariots, and ten thousand Foot-men of all his people.

§. III.

Of the later Kings, and decay and overthrow of their power.

a Reg. 13.
2 Reg. 22.
c. 9.

After Hazael, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the son of Hazael, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel with ill success: for Joas King of Israel, the son of the unhappy Joashaz, as he was foretold by Elisba the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three several battles: and he lost all those Cities to Israel, which his father Hazael had taken violently from Joashaz.

2 Reg. 13.
1. 7. c. 6.

After this Benhadad the son of Hazael, there succeeded three others by the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, onely Nicholas Damascenus cited by Josephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Jeroboam the second, the son of Joas, recovered Damascus it self to Juda, saith the Geneva, but better in Junius, Vique recuperabat Damascus. & Chamatham Jebuda pro Israele; that is, And how he recovered for Israel, Damascus and Chamatha of Judaea, for these Cities sometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the Tribe of Juda.

And it is likely, that this conquest upon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then living, of whom there is no Story. For when as Jeroboam the King of the ten Tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the son of Hazael, and had recovered the Cities which Hazael had won from Israel; and so left his Kingdom to his son Jeroboam the second; it seemeth that this Jeroboam without delay, and having nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and invaded Damascus.

Razin, or Razin, after Josephus, Rafes; after Zonaras, Rafon the tenth Adad, making league with Pekab, or Phacaz King of Israel, against Achaz King of Juda; both carry away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Hierusalem: but in vain. Then Adad alone invadeth Elat, and beating out the Jews, maketh it a Colony of Syrians. Wherefore Achaz brought Teglatphalassar against Razin, who took him and beheaded him, and won Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads, and the Kingdom of Damascus: the Affrians becoming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads, as they reigned in order are thus reckoned:

- 1 Adadexer the son of Rehob.
- 2 Razin the son of Eliadad, or Razin.
- 3 Hazin.
- 4 Tabremmon.
- 5 Benhadad, who invaded Basba.
- 6 Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achaz.

7 Hazael, whom Elisba foretold with tears of his advancement, the same who overthrew Jeram King of Israel at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazael which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Hazael which took Geth, and compounded the war with Joas, made the Expedition thirty years, and perchance more, after the first Hazael which stifled his master Benhadad, and had slain Jeram the son of Achaz King of Israel. For Joas began to reign in the 7. year of Jehu King of Israel; and after he had reigned 23. years, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Hazael took Geth, and turned his face towards Jerusalem. It is also some proof that Hazael that took Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murdered Benhadad, because he could not at that time be of good years, being as it seemeth, the second person in the Kingdom, and Commander of Benhadad's men of war. To this Hazael (be he the first or second) succeeded.

8 Benhadad, the third, whom Joash King of Israel thrice overthrew.

9 Razin, or Razin, the last, who joyned with Pekab King of Israel, against Juda, at which time Achaz King of Juda waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now between Benhadad the third, and Razin the last, Nicholas Damascenus finds three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelve in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but Reguli, as those of Emath, and Gessur, we find that Tobus was King of Emath, or Camath, in David's time, to whom he sent his son Jeram with presents, after David's victory against Adadexer. Also Senacherib speaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not.

§. IV.

Of Other lesser Kingdoms of the Syrians, which being brought under the Affrians, never recovered themselves again.

OF Gessur we find two Kings named; to wit, Talmat, and his Father Amimur: to Talmat, whose Daughter David married, it it was that Abshalom fled, who was his maternal Grandfather. Of the Kings of Seppena, or Syria, Soba, or Celofyria, there are two named, Rehob, or Rehob, the Father of Adadexer, and Adadexer himself; and it is plain that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a City better fitting their greatness. After Razin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria (which became so potent, and joyned Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desart of Arabia, with other Provinces into one, under Razin the second of the Adads) as it began with David, so it ended at once with the Kingdom of Israel. For Achaz King of Juda waged the Affrian Teglatphalassar against Pekab King of Israel, and against Razin the last King of Damascus: which Teglat first invaded Damascus, and the Region of Soba, and took Damascus it self, and did put to death Razin the last, carrying the Inhabitants captive. This was the second time that the Affrians attempted Israel. For first Phul Belochus entered the borders thereof (Menabem governing Israel) who stopt the enterprize of Phul with a thousand talents of silver: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree we will examine hereafter, being scarce warm, as yet, in his seat at Babylon, which he, with the help of his companion Arabees, had wrested from Sardanapalus: having besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his son Teglat following the purpose of his father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the war begun between Israel and Juda, Pekab commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Razin being also wrapt in that war, and wasted in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Juda, his impromptu and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, he carried it (as is before remembered) and then with great ease posselt himself of the Cities of Nephtalim; leading with him a great part of the people captive. And his son Salmanasser, whom Ptolemy called Nabonasser, after the revolt of Hofea, forced Samarita, and rent that Kingdom alunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted, the race and Monarchy of the Syrian Adads in Razin, whom Teglat slaughtered; the Kingdom of Israel in Hofea, whom Salmanasser overturned; happened near about a time: that of Ninus in the daies of Belochus, and the other two in the daies of Teglatphalassar, and Salmanasser his son. For Sardanapalus perished, Ofia ruling Juda, and the other two Kingdoms were dissolved, Achaz yet living.

Lastly, the Kingdom of Juda it self, being attempted by Senacherib, the son of Salmanasser, in vain, and preserved for the time by God miraculously, was at length utterly overturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132. years after the captivity of Israel and Samarita: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth year of Hofea: that of Juda in the eleventh of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Affria and Babylon held also the Kingdom of Syria, from the eighth year of Salmanasser to the last of Baltassar, whom Herodotus calleth Labyntius: in all about 200. years. After these the Persians from Cyrus to Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. years.

Then Alexander Macedon took this among other Provinces of the Persian Empire, and his successors the Seleucida reigned therein, till it became subject unto the power of the Romans, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turks, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the Nations bordering upon the Israelites, with whom they had most to do, both in war and peace, being the only people, whose History in those ancient times carried an assured face of Truth.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Tribe of Benjamin, and of Hierusalem.

§. I.

Of divers memorable places in the Tribe of Benjamin, whereof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mitspa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah, and Gibba.

OF the Tribe of Benjamin, the twelfth and youngest son of Jacob, whom he had by Rachel, there were mustered at Mount Sinai 35000. able bodies: all which perishing in the Desarts, there entered the Holy Land of their issues 45600. fit to bear Arms: and these had their Territory on this side Jordan, between Juda and Ephraim. The Cities

^{1 Chron. 8. 12.} Cities within this Tribe nearest Jordan, are Lod, Hadid, and Ono: of which, Lod and Ono were built by Shemed a Benjaminite; they were all three re-inhabited with Benjamites, after the return out of Captivity, as is mentioned, Nehem. 11. 35. and Esd. 2. 35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes besides Hadid in Nehemia, a City called Lod-hadid: This Hadid or Chudid was rebuilt by Simon Macababaeus.

^{Mat. 11. 38.} Samarim, or Tjemaraim, named of Tjemary one of the sons of Canaan, was another of their Cities; and further into the Land standeth Jericho, one of the Toparchies and the last of Juda, seated in a most fruitful Valley, adorned with many Palm-trees: and therefore elsewhere called the City of Palms. From the time of Jofua, who utterly destroyed it, it lay waste untill the time of Schadai, in whose daies Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the lofs of Abiram his eldest son, and built the gates of it in the lofs of his youngest son Segub: according to the curse of Jofua: in which and other respects, Hof. 12. 14. calleth Jofua a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Vespasian, and rebuilt by Adrian.

^{* 1 Chron. 6. 60.} To the South-east of Jericho stood * Hakmon of the Levites, of which Jof. 21. 18. To the South Beitaraba, of which Jof. 15. 25. and 18. 28. Then that Gilgal of which there is so much mention in the Scripture, where Jofua first ate of the fruits of the land, circumcised all those born in the Deserts, and celebrated the Passover.

^{Deut. 11. 30.} The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymology of this name (for it seems by the place, Deut. 11. 30. that the name was known before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Jof. 5. 9. Ob devotionem probrī Aegyptiaci, because their fore-skins (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled down the Hill: from thence was called Colles repugnatorum. This Gilgal was also called Gelilot, as appears by comparing the places, Jof. 15. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Jof. 22. 13. and Gelilot signifieth borders. It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, over against the two Hills Garazim and Hebal: upon the one of which the blessings, and on the other the curses were to be read to the people, both being the Mountains of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Atitpa of Benjamin (of which also we read oft in the Scripture) were seated about the midst of the length of the land of Canaan: for which reason (a) Samuel chose these two places, to either of which he came yearly to give judgement to the Israelites; of which two, Gilgal (as is said) was near Jordan on the East side of this Tribe and Atitpa near the West Sea, towards the land of the Philistims.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel used yearly to come, is Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Benjamin. But to return to Gilgal, which was the first place where the Ark resided, after they past over Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-Jeharim, and at length to Hierusalem) here in Gilgal it was that Jofua pitched up the 12. stones, which were taken out of the channel of Jordan, when it was dry, that the Israelites might pass over it: by which Story, as it is set down Jof. 4. it appears, that the same day that they passed over Jordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal it was that Samuel hewed Agas the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Atitpa, whither Samuel came yearly to give judgement, there also were often the greatest meetings held: as that for the revenge of the Levite, wife against Gibba, and the Benjamites, Jof. 19. 20. 1. and another against the Philistims, 1 Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Judas Macababaeus gathered the Jews (when Hierusalem was besieged by the Heathens) as it is 1 Mac. 3. 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added; Quia locus orationis fuerat Atitpa adversus Israhel. Touching this Atitpa, to avoid confusion, it is to be remembered, that the Scriptures mention four places of this name: Atitpa of Juda, of which Jof. 15. 38. (c) Atitpa of Gilead, of which we have spoken already in the Tribe of Gad. Atitpa of the Moabites, where David for a while held him; and lastly, this chief Atitpa of the Benjamites. And as in this place the chief meetings were held both before Hierusalem was recovered from the Philistines, and also in the time of the Macababees (as we have said) when Hierusalem was held by the wicked under Antiochus, so also in the time of Hierem, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Gedaliah whom Nabuchodonosor left in Jewry, as Governor over those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: until (to the great hurt of the Jews) he was slain by the treachon of Ismael, one of the royal blood of Juda, as it is in Jerem. 41.

^{Jof. 1. 8.} As appears by that which is added, Perfectorum, Jof. 1. 8. notes the three quarters, North, West, and East, to which he followed the Cananites, though Adrichomius and others out of this place interpret Atitpa or Atitpa (as they write) in the Tribe of Asher.

Near

Near unto this Atitpa, the Scripture mentioneth Beitar, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the Stone of help: where Samuel pitched up the Pillar or Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistims.

Touching Bethel, which (as it seems) was the third place where Samuel held his chief meetings for the ministring of Justice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the illue of Joseph (though it belonged to the portion of Benjamin, as it is Nehem. 11. 31. and Jof. 18. 22.) and how another City called Luz (d) near adjoining to it, was built by the man of the City which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Jud. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Jacob's vision: and how Jeroboam, by erecting one of his calves here, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it (e) Beth-aven, that is, the house of Vanity, Hof. 4. 15. and 10. 5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so well known out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may well pass them over.

The Territory of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdom of the ten Tribes, from the time of the great victory of Abia against Jeroboam, of which 2 Chron. 13. was taken from them, and adjoined to the Kingdom of Juda: and so it continued, as appears by the Story of Jofias: which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2 Reg. 23. whence those calls 1 Mac. 11. 34. are called Apheerama, which Greek word signifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the ten Tribes. It was one of the three Seignories, or Perseides which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Jews, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appears 2 Chron. 13. 19. was Hebronia, which Jof. 18. 23. is called Hophram, belonging to this Tribe of Benjamin.

Not far from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we find three other Cities, often mentioned in the Scriptures, Rama, Gidba, and Geba. Of the name Rama, (f) it is noted already, in the description of Ephraim, that there were many Towns so called, because of their high situation. But whereas they find out Rama in the Tribe of Juda (as it seems, because Matt. 2. it appears that it bordered Bethlehem) and also out of Brochard and Reidenbach make Silo to have been called Rama, and find yet another Rama in Zabulon; these three have no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Asher, as it seems, we have testimony, Jof. 19. 29. and of another in Nephtalim, Jof. 19. 36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim, 1 Sam. 25. 1. which more often is called (g) Ramatha, and 1 Sam. 1. 1. Ramathaim Septaginta: for which the Septaginta have Aramathaim-jophim, taking the Article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they think Jofeph of Aramathaim, Matt. 27. 57. was denominated.

Of a fourth Rama we read, 2 Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramoth in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Benjamin, seated, as we said, near Bethel (the uttermost South-border of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes: for which cause Basia in the time of Asa King of Juda, fortified it, to hinder those that did fly from him to Asa). Of this Rama, or Ramatha, I should rather think Jofeph was, that buried Christ: because it was nearer to Hierusalem, and after 13. 14. the Captivity belonged to Judaea, as it appears, Esd. 2. 26. wherein that it is joined with Geba, it is plain that he speaketh of that Rama with whose stones (after Basia had cauled to build it) Asa (as it is 1 Reg. 25. 22.) built Gebah adjoining to it: both being lying in Benjamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the ten Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdom of Juda: whence 2 Reg. 23. 8. we read that Jofias through all his Kingdom, even from Gebah, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba, which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third City Gibba, which was the City of Saul (the wickedness of which City in the time of the Judges had almost utterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius counts the bounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguished, Esf. 10. 27.) of which word (b) Gibba, in another front Gibbath, he imagineth Gibbaath, another City in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinity of this City also to Rama of Benjamin appears, Jud. 19. 13. where the Levite with his Wife, not able to reach to Rama, took up his lodging at Gibba. By that place of 1 Sam. 22. 6. it seems that there was in this Gibba some Tower or Citadel called Rama: where Junius reads in Jof. 18. 23. excesso, for in Rama: but it may be that the name of the Kings Palace in this City was Rama: as it seems that in Rama of Samuel, the name of the chief place where Samuel with the College of Prophets resided, was Najoth. The great City of Hai (for this word is used oft times in the Scripture) lay neerer Beth-aven, upon the East of Bethel (Hill) but Adrichomius taking notice of this, build, as City Gadath upon this Text, and placeth it in Benjamin, when as the words adjoined, note that this Hill was in the Mountains of Ephraim.

was in this Tribe, as is proved, Neh. 7. 10. 30. though it be not named by Jos. c. 18. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Jos. 8. 28. In solitudinem, in tumulum perpetuum. Another City of chief note is reckoned Jos. 18. 25. In this Tribe was Gibbon, the chief City of the Hewites: whose cunning to bind the Israelites by oath to save their lives, is set down, Jos. 9. whence they were reckoned among the * Nethinai, or Profligates, and were bound to certain publick services in the house of God: whose oath of saving these Gebonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine, 2 Sam. 21. 1. This Gibbon, or Gibbon with Almon and Febab (of both which we have spoken) and with Hanothoth the natal place of Hieremy the Prophet, were said Jos. 21. 28. to be given to the Levites by the Benjaminites. Near to this Hanothoth was Nob, as appears, 1 Reg. 2. 26. where Abiathar the Priest, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanothoth. It is reckoned in the Tribe of Benjamin, Neh. 9. 31. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Ark was at Kireath-jebairim: yet by the lamentable tragedy of blood-shed, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set down 1 Sam. 21. and 22.) in the judgement of Junius, it is proved that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Micmas also in this Tribe, Nehem. 9. 31. was a place of fame, of which Ezay. 10. 28. where also he nameth Gallim, and Migrom in this Tribe. In Micmas Saul had his Camp, 1 Sam. 13. 2. (when he left Gibba to Jonathan) and there also was Jonathan Macchabeus his abode, 1 Macc. 9. 73. Of Giscala in Galilee Josephus makes often mention, but of any here in Benjamin, which they make the natal place of Saint Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, he failed with his parents to Tharsus, of this find no good warrant. Other places of less importance I omit, and come to the City of Hierusalem, and the Princes and Governours of this City: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Benjamin, whence Jos. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Benjamin.

§. II.

Of divers memorable things concerning Hierusalem.

AT what time Hierusalem was built (which afterward became the Princess of all Cities) it doth not appear. Some there are who imagine that Melchisedec was the Founder thereof in Abraham's time. But,

* according to others, that City out of which Melchisedec encountered Abraham (in his return from the overthrow of the Assyrian and Perſian Kings or Captains, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the River of Jordan, in the half Tribe of Manasse bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salcm, and by the Greeks Solima.

Hierusalem (whence ever, or by whomsoever built) was a principal City in Josia his time: yet not so renowned as Hazor the Metropolis (in those dayes and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek (whom Josia slew) was then King of Hierusalem. That it was belonging to the Jebusites it is manifest: for how long soever they held it before Moses time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400. years after him: even till David won it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Jebusites (the children of Jebus the son of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Jebus. And so much did that Nation rely on the strength of the place, as when David attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blind, and impotent people should defend it.

David, after he had by Gods assistance possessed it, and turned out the Jebusites, gave it an exceeding great increase of circuit; strengthened it with a Citadel or Castle; and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Jebusalem, the City of the Jebusites, to Hierusalem, which the Greeks call Hierosolima. After David's time Solomon amplified, beautified and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the work of the Temple, which was no less admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, Gates, and Walls, could not any where in the world be exemplated: and besides, that it had 150000. Inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60. foot depth, cut out of the very rock: and 250. foot of breadth: whereof the like hath seldom been heard of, either since or before.

After the death of Solomon, and that the Kingdom of the Jews was cut asunder, Shishac King of Egypt, and his Predecessor, having bred up for that purpose Adad the Idumean, and Jeroboam Solomon's servant; and both married to Egyptians: the State by the one disturbed, by the other broken: Shishac first invaded the Territory of Juda, entered Hierusalem, and sack't it, and became Master not only of the riches of Solomon, but of all those spoils which David had gotten from Adadazer, Tobu, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was again sack't, and a part of the wall thrown down by Josias King of Israel: while while Amasis the twelfth King thereof governed Juda.

Not long after, Achas the fifteenth King of Juda impoverished the Temple, and presented Teghtabalaſſer with the treasures thereof. And Manasse the son of Ezekiab, the son of Achas, by the vaunts made by Ezekiab, to the Embassadors of Merodach, lost the remain, and the very bottom of their treasures. It was again spoiled by the Babylonians, Josiah then reigning. But this ungrateful, Idolatrous and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods gentle corrections and afflictions: but persisting in all kind of impiety, filling the City even to the mouth with innocent blood, God raised up that great Babylonian King Nebuchodonosor, as his scourge and revenger, who making this glorious City and Temple, with all the Palaces therein, and the Walls and Towers which embraced them, even and level with the dust, carried away the spoils with the Princes and people, and crushed them with the heavy yoke of bondage and servitude full seventy years, inasmuch as Sion was not only become as a torn and plowed-up field, Hierusalem an heap of stones, and rubble, the Mountain of the Temple as a grove, or wood of thorns and briars, but (as Hierome speaketh) even the birds of the Ayre scorned to fly over it, or the beasts to tread on that desiled soil.

Then 70. years being expired, according to the Prophecy of Daniel, and the Jews by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was again built, though with interruption and difficulty enough: and the City meanly inhabited, and without Walls or other defences, for some 60. and odd years, till Nebemias by the favour of Artaxerxes re-built them. Then again was the Temple and City spoiled by Bagoſes, or Vagoſes, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes: after by * Ptolomaeus the first; then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and again by Apollonius his Lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Craſſus in his Parthian expedition took as much as he could of that which Pompey spared.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompensed by the industry or bounty of good Princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberality of strangers. Before the captivity, the people of the Land, through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repair the Temple of Solomon. The wrong done by Ptolomaeus Lagus to the second Temple, was requited by the bounty of his son Ptolomaeus Philadelphus. The mischief wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great offerings which were sent to Hierusalem out of other Nations. Finally, all the losses, which either the City or Temple had endured, might well seem forgotten in the reign of Herod, that usurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the City, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous works did adorn them; that he left them far more stately and glorious than they had been in the dayes of Solomon.

§. III.

Of the destruction of Hierusalem by the Romans.

IN this flourishing estate it was at the coming of our Saviour Christ Jesus: and after his death and ascension, it to continued about forty years. But then did Titus the Romane, being stirred up by God to be the revenger of Christ's death, and to punish the Jews sinful ingratitude, incompassate it with a Roman Army, and became Lord thereof. He began the siege at such time as the Jews from all parts were come up to the celebration of the Paschever: so as the City was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts: and no manner of provision or store for any such multitudes. An extreme famine, with the civil dissension, oppressed them within the Walls; a forcible enemy assailed them without. The Idumeans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Jews Kingdom, thrust themselves into the City, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor took it. And to be short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging, to the consummation of the victory, eleven hundred thousand souls: and the City was so beaten down and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly believe that there had been any such place or habitation. Only the three Herodian Towers, (works most magnificent, and overtopping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Romane Garrisons, as that thereby their victory might be the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and state remaining, after ages might judge what the rest were; and their honour be the greater and more shining, that there-over became victorious.

After this, such Jews as were scattered here and there in Judea, and other Provinces, began began again to inhabit some part of the City; and by degrees to re-build it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and Tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65. years, when they again offered to revolt and rebel, Adrianus the Emperor slaughtered many thousands of them, and overturned those three Herodian Towers, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himself had foretold; That there should not stand one stone upon another of that ungrateful City. Afterward, when his fury was appeased, and the prophecy accomplished, he took one part without the Wall, wherein stood Mount Calvary, and the Sepulchre of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he again made it a City of great capacity, and called it after his own name, Ælia Capitolia. In the gate toward Bethel, he caused a Sow to be cut in Marble, and set it in the front thereof, which he did in despite of the Jews Nation: making an Edict, that they should not from thenceforth ever enter into the City, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place over-topping it.

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palestina, it was inhabited at length by all Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. years.

It was afterward in the 636. year after Christ, taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odd years.

In the year 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Buillon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens; which Godfrey, when he was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crown of Gold, because Christ, for whom he fought, was therein crowned with thorns. After this recovery, it remained under the Successors of Godfrey fourscore and eight years: till in the year 1197. it was regained by Saladin of Egypt; and lastly, in the year 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turks cast out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbarce, or the Holy City. Neither was it Jerusalem alone that had so often times been beaten down and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World have with their Inhabitants, in several times and ages, suffered the same shipwreck. And it hath been Gods just will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not only to punish the impiety of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by slavery; but he hath revenged himself of the very places they possess; of the wals and buildings, yea, of the soil and the beasts that fed thereon.

For, even that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect lost all her fertility and fruitfulness; witness the many hundreds of thousands which it fed in the dayes of the Kings of Juda and Israel: it being at this time all over, in effect, exceeding lony and barren. It also pleased God, not only to consume with fire from Heaven the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soil itself hath felt, and doth feel the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beasts that belonged to Amalec, no not any small number of them to be sacrificed to himself: neither was it enough that Achan himself was stoned, but that his moveables were so consumed and brought to ashes.

§. IV.

Of the vain and malicious reports of Heathen Writers, touching the ancient Jews.

OF the original of the Jews, profane Writers have conceived diversely and injuriously. Quintilian speaks infamously of them, and of their Leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Egyptians. Others affirm, that while Sin governed Egypt, the people were so increased, as Jerusalem and Judas led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions: which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidental, because he was taken up and saved out of the waters. But Justin, of all other most malicious, doth derive the Jews from the Syrian Kings; of whom Damasius, saith he, was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He again suppoeth (somewhat contrary to himself) that Israel had ten sons, among whom he divided the land of Juda; so called of Judas his eldest, who had the greatest portion. The youngest of the sons of Israel he calleth Joseph: who being brought up in Egypt, became learned in Magical Arts, and in the interpretation of Dreams, and signs prodigious; and this Joseph (saith he) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foul diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished Egypt. Further, he telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Desarts they suffered extreme thirst and famine, and therein found relief the seventh day, for this cause ever after observed the seventh day, and kept it Holy; making it a law among themselves; which afterward became a branch of their Religion. He addeth also, that they might not marry marry out of their own Tribes, lest discovering their uncleanness, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Egyptians. These and the like fables hath Justin.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grossly belie them, in affirming, that in the inmost Oratory of their Temple, they had the golden head of an As, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himself, having in the fifth book of his own History truly confessed of the Jews, that they worshipped one only God: and thought it most prophane to represent the Deity by any material figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature: and they had therefore in their Temples no Image or Representation, no not so much as in any City by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus; who also makes Judas with Idumea, the first parents of the Jews.

Claudius Iulian draws them from Judeus, whose parents were Spartan and Thebe; whence it came, that the Spartans or Lacedæmonians challenged kinned of the Hebrews: but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Josephus. Some of these reports seem to have been gathered out of divine letters, though wrested and perverted, according to the custom of the Heathen. For to have they obscured and altered the Story of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Flood; and given new names to the children of Adam in the first age, to Noah and his sons in the second; and to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the rest of the Fathers, and Leaders of the Hebrews: all which feignings, as touching the Jews and their originals, Josephus against Apion, and Tertullian have sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrews were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and so Chaldeans originally, taking name either of Heber, the son of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandering, as is before remembered. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greek Grammarians, derive the Hebrews, or Jews, from Araban; having mistaken the name of Abraham, who was the son of Heber, in the sixth descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abraham: for after Jacob, otherwife Israel, the chief part were called Israel, another part after Ejau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being most of the Tribe of Juda, honoured the name of Judas, the son of Jacob, and became Judeans, or Jews; as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the son of Joseph, the chief of the Patriarchs of the ten Tribes, the rest of the ten Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdom of Israel fell: The Judeans continued their names, though they suffered the same servitude not long after, under Nabuchodonosor.

The government which this Nation underwent, was first paternal: which continued till they served the Egyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captains and Leaders, Moses and Joshua, by a policy Divine. Thirdly, they subjected themselves to Judges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom, and his Successors, before we intreat, we are first to speak of their government under Judas, after the death of Joshua: with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

Of the memorable things that happened in the World, from the death of Joshua, to the War of Troy: which was about the time of Jephtha.

§. I.

Of the Inter-regnum after Joshua's death: and of Othoniel.

WHEN Joshua was now dead, who with the advice of the 70. Elders, and the high Priest, held authority over the people, and ordered that Common-weal: it pleased God to direct the Tribe of Juda (in whom the Kingdom was afterward established) to undertake the War against the Canaanites, over whom (with Gods favour, and the assistance of Simeon) they became victorious. In the first attempt which they made, they not only slew ten thousand, but made Adonibezek prisoner: the greatest and cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizites. This tyrants cruelty, as elsewhere hath been signified, they returned in the same kind upon his own head: and so by the torments which he now felt in his own person (before (before no otherwise known unto him but by his malicious imagination) made him confess and acknowledge Gods judgments against himself.

The Tribes of Juda and Simeon did also master and possess during this Inter-regnum (or as some think, before the death of Josua) the Cities of Asotus, Askalon, Ekyron, and Hierusalem, which they burnt, and the Jebusites after re-edified. They took also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathsepher, and Zepath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not set down in express words that any one person commanded in chief over the people, as Moses and Josua did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authority among them: and that he, with the advice of Phinees, directed and ordered their wars. For if any think that they proceeded without a Chief, the good success which followed their undertakings, witnesseth the contrary. And it was Caleb, even while Josua governed, as appears, Jos. 10. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Captains: for the performance of which enterprise, he promised his daughter Achlah: which he performed to Othoniel his younger brother after the conquest: whose behaviour in that service was such, as (next unto the ordinance of God) it gave him the greatest reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Judge soon after. But while those of Juda made war with their borderers, from whom they onely recovered the mountainous Countries (for they could not drive out the Inhabitants of the Vallies, because they had Chariots of Iron.) The rest of the Tribes fought also to enlarge and establish their own Territories. In which war they laboured with variable success: for as the house of Joseph recovered Beibet, or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recover from Dan all the plain Countries, and forced them to save themselves in the Mountains. And now the Israelites, unmindful of Gods benefits, and how often he had miraculously a-fore-time defended them, and made them victorious over their enemies (the Elders being also consumed, who better advised them in the Inter-regnum) did not only join themselves in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more detestable) they served the Idols of Baal, and Asteroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God, whom they had provoked with their Idolatry, deliver them into the hands of the Aramites of Mejopotamia, whom Chusban Rishathaim at that time commanded.

But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight years, it pleased him to have compassion on his people and to raise up Othoniel to be their Judge and Leader: who by Gods assistance, delivered his brethren from oppression, and informed the Aramites to return into their own Desarts, and into Mejopotamia adjoining: after which the Israelites had peace forty years: during all the time of Othoniel government. This Othoniel is thought by Tosha-268 tur, to have been the younger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the book of Judges, he is twice called Othoniel, the son of Cenas, Caleb younger brother. Others do rather interpret those words [Caleb younger brother] as if they signified the meanest of his kindred. Indeed it is not likely that Caleb Daughter should marry with her own Uncle; yet it follows not therefore that Othoniel should have been the meanest of the kindred. Wherefore we may better think that he was the Nephew of Caleb, (as some learned men expound it) and as the very words of Scripture seem to enforce. For Caleb was, the son of Jephunneh, and Othoniel the son of Cenas, Caleb younger brother; that is he was not brother to Caleb, but his younger brothers son; to whom it was not onely lawful, but commendable to marry with his Cousin German Caleb Daughter.

How long it was from the death of Josua, to the government of Othoniel, it cannot be found: but it seems to have been no short time. For many wars were made in that space against the people of the Land. Lafio was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best Writers are of opinion, that between the times of Josua and Othoniel, that civil war brake out between the Benjaminites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Levites Wife. For it is written, that in those dayes there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes. And as Juda led the people against the Canaanites, during the Inter-regnum, so was he commanded to do against Benjamin, even by the Lord God, whose direction they craved, as wanting a Judge to appoint what should be done; which sheweth it to have been when Josua was dead, and before the government of Othoniel, especially considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Governours, were spent under such oppression of strangers, as would have given them no leave to have attempted such a civil war, if their power had been as great, as it was in the managing of this action; wherein they so weakened the body of their estate, by effusion of blood, that in many ages they they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had multered against their bordering enemies.

§. II.

Of the memorable things of this age in other Nations: and of the difficulty in the computation of times.

Here lived in this age of Othoniel, Pandion, or Pandareus, according to Homer, the fifth King of Athens, who began to rule in the twentieth year of Othoniel, and governed forty years. He was father to Erichonius: his daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes of whose daughter Semele was born Dionysius or Liber Pater: under whom Linus the Musician lived. In his time also the Cities of Helus, Paphus, and Thasus were built.

Ida and Dactylus flourished in this age, who are said to have found out the use of Iron: but Geneſis hath taught us the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunningly both in Iron and Brass. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus governed Thebes: whom divers Chronologists find in Ehuds time. But S. Augustine making a repetition of those fables, which were devised among the Grecians and other Nations, during the government of the Judges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is as little agreement. Vices upon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augustine de Civit. Dei, and the eighteenth book, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progeny, where he that desires his pedigree may find it. Laſantius and Eusebius make him native of Attica: and the son of Elenus King of Eleusina: which Elenus by careful industry had fed the people of that Territory in the time of a great famine. This, when upon the like occasion Triptolemus could not perform, fearing the fury of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kind of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prow a graven or carved Serpent; who because he made exceeding great speed to return and to relieve his people with Corn from some neighbour Nation: it was feigned by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the air.

Whether the times of these Kings, which lived together with Othoniel, and after him, with the rest of the Judges and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set down, I cannot avow; for the Chronologists, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars; to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I erre with others of better judgment. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselves to conversant with these ancient Kings, and with the very year when they began to rule) have hit the mark of time, of all other the farthest off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors themselves, from whom the ancientest Chronologists have borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their own works, but conjecture. Secondly, because their own disagreement and contention in those elder dayes, with that of our own age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any mans understanding, save his own; but that he is greatly distracted, after what pattern to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not onely in the reigns of Heathen Kings and Princes; but even in the computation of those times which the indisputable authority of holy Scripture hath summed up, as in that of Abrahams birth; and after in the times of the Judges and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Solomon Temple, in the Persian Empire, the seventy Weeks, and in what not? Wherefore the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposite, and contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men have sought by so many ways to uncover the Sun, that the days thereby are made more dark, and the clouds more condensed than before: I can therefore give no other warrant, than other men have done in these computations: and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdoms took beginning in that or that year, I avow it no otherwise than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least as a private opinion: which I submit to better judgments. Nam in priscis rebus veritas non ad unguem querenda; In ancient things we are not to require an exact narration of the truth, says Diodore.

§. III.

Of Ehuds time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tytiis, Admetus, and others that lived about these times.

After the death of Othoniel, when Israel fell back to their former Idolatry, God encouraged Moab to invade and suppress them: to perform which, he joyned the forces forces of Ammon, and Amalec unto his own, and so (as all kind of misery readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawn his help from, thereby to make them feel the difference between his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easie conquest over Israel, whom God himself exposed to those perils, within which they were so speedily folded up. In this miserable estate they continued full eighteen years under Eglon King of the Moabites and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his ears from their crying repentance: but raised up Ehud the son of Gera to deliver them: by which weak man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the justness of his quarrel, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, he resolved to attempt upon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguish, he assured himself of the following victory: especially giving his Nation no time to re-establish their government, or to choose a King to command and direct them in the Wars. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embassador to Eglon, laden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining private access, upon the pretence of some secret to be revealed, he pierc'd his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge: and shutting the doors of his closet upon him, escaped.

It may seem, that being confident of his good success, he had prepared the strength of Israel in readiness. For suddenly after his return, he did re-pass Jordan, and invading the Territory of Moab, overthrew their Army, consisting of 10000. able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victory, and that Samgar his Successor had miraculously slain 600. Philistines with an Ox-goad: the Land and People of Israel lived in peace unto the end of fourscore years from the death of Othniel, which term expired in the Worlds year 2691.

In the dayes of Ehud, Naomi, with Eliemelch her husband, and with her two sons, travelled into Moab, and so the story of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourscore years which are given to Ehud, it was that Orcus King of the Molossians, otherwise Pluto, stole Proserpina, as he walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hippogonim in Sicilia: or (according to Pausanias) by the River Cephissus, which elsewhere he calleth Chemer, if he mean not two distinct Rivers. This stealth being made known to Pyriphous, with whom Hercules and Theseus joyned themselves, they agreed together to recover her: but Pluto, or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dog, which fastened on Pyriphous, and tare him in pieces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him, and by strength took and mastered the Dog Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his delivering Theseus out of Hell. But Zeus, as I take it, hath written this story somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyriphous, saith he, attempted to steal Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proserpina: Proserpina being a general name also for all fair women. This purpose of theirs being known to Aidonius, Theseus and Pyriphous were both taken; and because Pyriphous was the principal in this conspiracy, and Theseus drawn on by a kind of affection or enforcement, the one was given for food to Aidonius his great Dog Cerberus, the other held prisoner, till Hercules, by the instigation of Euristheus, delivered him by strong hand. The Moloss, which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a people of Epirus, inhabiting near the Mountains of Pindus: of which Mountains Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himself. The River of Acheron (which the Poets describe to be in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molossi in Theffali: but these are neighbours to the Cassopaei, saith Plutarch in his Greek questions.

The rape of Orithya, the daughter of Erythraeus, King of Athens, taken away by Zeus of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the North-wind; because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In this time also Tereus ravished Philomela, of which the fable was devised of her conversion into a Nightingale. For Tereus having married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her sister, forced her in her passage, and withall cut out her tongue, that she might not complain; perswading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother-in-laws merciless behaviour towards her, Philomela expressed by her needle upon cloath, and sent unto Progne. In revenge whereof, Progne caused her onely son Tityo to be cut in pieces, and set before Tereus her husband, so drest as it appeared to be some other ordinary food: of which when he had eaten his fill, he caused his head, hands and feet, to be presented unto him: and then fled away with such speed towards Athens, Athens, where her Father Pandion yet lived, as the Poets feigned, that she was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo finds to be Daulis, in Phocis: and the Tomb of Tereus, Pausanias hath built near the Rocks Atergi, in the Territory of Athens. By which, as also by the name Daulis, where these things are supposed to have been done (whence also Philomela is called Daulimales) it appears that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digression in his Peloponnesian War. That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryse, (as the Poets call him Odrysius) but that Phocis a Country in Greece not far from Attica, a City whereof is called Daulia, was in Pandion's time inhabited by Thracians, of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion, to have amity with his neighbours, made him his son-in-law: as it is good to believe, saith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom he might have succour, rather than with any Tereus, that should have held the Kingdom of Odryse, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chose a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seem to have been, partly because, as Pausanias says, Daulide nec midificant, nec habitant in tota circum regione Hirundines; as if a Swallow, remembering the wrong that was there done to her, and her sister, did for ever after hate that place.

Near this time Melampus (who is said to have understood the voices of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. He restored to their former health the Daughters of Proetus King of the Argives, who (as the Poets please) were made mad by Juno: and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to be constrained to the Plough: for in those Countries where the ground was light, they did use often to plough with Kine.

In the seven and fortieth year of Ehud, Tros began to reign in Dardania, and gave it his own name; about which time Phemone the chief Priest of Apollo in Delfos, devised the Heroical Verse,

Of the same date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Eusebius makes King of Phrygia: and also of that part of which the people were anciently Maeones. Of Tantalus was devised the fable that some Poets have applied to the passion of love: and some to the covetous that dare not enjoy his riches. Eusebius calls this Tantalus the son of Jupiter, by the Nymph Pleta: Diaconus and Didymus in Zeus, give him another mother. He was said to be the son of Jupiter, as some will have it, because he had that Planet in his ascendant, betokening Wildom and Riches. It is said, that when he made a feast to the gods, having nothing more precious, he caused his own son to be slain and drest to the banquet: of whom Ceres are part of one of the shoulds; whereby was signified, that those men which seek after Divine knowledge, prefer nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their own children, of all else the most dearest. And where it was devised, that he had always Water and Fruit offered to his lips; and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacy of the world, yet his mind being otherwise, and to higher desires transported, he enjoyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Ovid:

Querit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat.

Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in water seeks for water, and doth mis.

The fleeting fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted upon him, for that he discovered the secrets of the gods: that is, because he taught wildom and vertue to mortal men: which story Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly express'd in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwise, and say, That Tantalus, though he excelled in riches, yet being thirsty of more abundance, was never satisfied. Of whom Horace against covetousness, Tantalus d labiis stiens fugientia captas Flumina; quid ridet? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirsting Tantalus doth catch at streams that from him flee.

Why laughest thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceive, where it is feigned of Tantalus, that he gave the Nectar and Ambrosia of the gods, to vain and unworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quod furatus, Coetaneis convivia, Nectar Ambrosiamque dedit.

Because

Because that stealing immortality,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia give To guests of his own age, to make them live.

Whereby it was meant, that the secrets of Divinity ought not to be imparted to the unpure Vulgar. For as the cleanest meats in a foul stomach, are therein corrupted, so the most high and reserved mysteries are often perverted by an unclean and defiled mind.

Mark 4. 11

To you it is given (saith Christ in Mark) to know the mystery of the Kingdom of God, but unto them that are without, all things be done in Parables. So it is said of him, that he expounded all things to his Disciples apart. And therefore doth Gregory Nazianzen suffer upon a place of S. Paul: Quod si Paulo li- cisset esset etiam, quorum ipsi cognitionem calumtertium & usque ad illud progressio suppeditaviti, fortasse de Deo, nobis aliquid amplius com-pararet; si Paul might have uttered the things, the knowledge whereof the third Heaven; and his going thither, did bring unto him, peradventure we might know somewhat more of God.

Mark 4. 14
Greg. in Orat. de

s. Cor. 13.

Pythagoras, saith Revelin, thought it not the part of a wife man, Assine lyram exponere, aut mysteria, que ita recipere, ut sus tubam, & si-dem gratulus, & unguenta scarabæus: quare silentium indicit discipulis, ne vulgo divinorum arcana patefacerent, que meditatio sacculus quam loquendo apprehenduntur. To let an Ass to a Harp, or to learn mysteries: which he would handle as a Swine doth a Trumpet, or a Joy a Viol, or Scarabæus, and unclean flies sovereign ointment. Wherefore he commanded silence to his Disciples, that they should not disclose divine mysteries to the common sort, which are easier learned by meditation than by babbling.
And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their mysteries among their Priests in certain Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might be hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of their covered meanings.

But to proceed with the contemporaries of Aod, or Ehnd, with him it is also said, that Tytius lived, whom Apollo slew, because he fought to force his mother Latona. Euphori- on hath it thus, that Tytius was the son of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloved of Jupiter, to avoid Ju- no's revenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where she was delivered of Tytius: whose Mother dying, and himself therein nourished, he was therefore called the son of the earth. Pausa- nias speaking of the grave of this Giant, assirms, that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his stature out of Homer:

Porrectusque novem Tytius per jugera terra.
Affiduas atro viscere pascit aves.

Nine furlongs stretch lies Tytius, who for his wicked deeds,

The hungry Birds with his renewing liver daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound: That Apollo killing this cruel and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a City in Phocæ, it was seigned by the Poets, to the terror of others, That he was still eaten in Hell by birds, and yet still lived, and had his flesh renewed.

Admetus, King of Thesaly, lived also in this age, whom it is said that Apollo first served as a Herd-man, and afterward, for his excellent wit, was by him advanced; but having slain Hyacinthus, he crost the Hellepont, and fled into Phrygia: where, together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in brick, for building of the walls of Troy, not by making the bricks leap into their places by playing on his Harp: according to him in Ovid, which saith:

Ilion afficiet, firmatque turribus altis
Mænia, Apollineæ structa canore lyra.

Strong Ilion thou shalt see with walls and towers high,
Built with the harp of wife Apollo's Harmony.

Thus the Poets: but others, that he laboured with his hands, as hired in this work.
And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megarians witness, saith Pausanias.

In these days also of Ehnd, or (as some find it) in the days of Deborah, lived Perseus, the son of Jupiter and Danae, by whose Souldiers (as they failed out of Peloponnesus, to seek their adventure on Africa side) Medusa, the Daughter and Successor of Phœbus, being weakly accompanied as the hunted, near the Lake Tritan, was surpris'd and slain:
whose beauty, when Perseus beheld, he caused her head to be imbalmed, and carried into Greece: the beauty whereof was such,
and so much admired, and the beholders so astonish'd which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, That all that looked on Medusa's head, were turned into stones.

Cecrops, the second of that name, and 7.
King of Athens, and Acridius the 13. or, after Ensebius,

Ensebius, in cliv.

Ensebius, the 14. King of the Argives, began also their reigns, as it is said, in the time of this Judge: of which the first ruled 40. years, and the second 31. years. Also Bello- rophon lived in this age, being the son of Glaukus, the son of Siphys: who inticed by Anteaor Sthenobia, the wife of Præus of the Argives, to accompany her, but refusing it, she accused him to her husband, that he offered to force her: whereupon Præus sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affairs of weight, between him and his son-in-law Jobates: giving secret order to Jobates to dispatch him: but Jobates thinking it dishonourable to lay violent hands on him, im-ployed him against Chimæra, a Monster vomiting, or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pitying his innocency, sent him the winged Horse, Pegasus, sprung up of the blood of Medusa, formerly slain by the souldiers of Perseus in Africa, to transport him; a horse that none other could master or bridle but Minerva: upon which beast Bellerophon overcame Chimæra: and performed the other services given him in charge: which done, as he returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to have slain him: but being victorious also over all those, he arrived to Jobates in safety: whom Jobates for his eminent virtues honoured, first with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdom: after which he grew so insolent, as he attempted to fly up to heaven upon his Pegasus: whose pride Jupiter dis-daining, caused one of his flaming flies so to vex Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophon from his back, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blind; of which burthen Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew back to heaven: and being fed in Jupiter's own stable, Aurora begg'd him of Jupiter to ride on before the Sun. This tale is diversely expounded; as first by some, That it plea-seth God to relieve men in their innocent and undeserved adversity, and to cast down those which are too high minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon:
that when he was exposed to extremest hazard, or rather certain death, he found both deliverance and honour: but waxing over-proud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, he was again thrown down into the extremity of sorrow, and ever during misery. Secondly by others, That under the name of Chimæra, was meant a cruel Pyrat of the Lycians, whose ship had in her prow a Lyon, a Goat in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the stern, of which three beasts this Monster Chimæra was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon pursued with a kind of Galley, of such swiftness, that it was called the flying Horse: to whom the invention of sails (the wings of a ship) are also attributed. Many other expositions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not unlikely, that Chimæra was the name of a ship, for so Virgil calleth one of the greatest ships of Aeneas.

Ion also, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquity of their parent Javan) derive their name of Iones, is said to have been about Ehnd's time: Homer calls them Jæones, which hath a near resemblance to the word Javan. Perhaps it might be so that Ion himself took name from Javan:
it being a custom observable in the Histories of all times, to revive the ancient name of a fore-father, in some the principal of his issue.

The invasion of India by Liber-Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: but
S. Augustine makes him far more ancient: Zib. 18. c.
placing him between the coming out of E- gypt, and the death of Josua. 12. de ci.

About the end of the 80. years, ascribed to Ehnd, and Samgar, Pelops flourished: who gave name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morea.

§. IV.

Of Deborah and her Contemporaries.

AFTER Israel had lived in peace and plenty to the end of these 80. years, they again began to forget the giver of all goodness, and many of those being worn out, which were witnesses of the former misery, and of Gods deliverance by Ehnd; and after him by Samgar: the rest began to return to their former neglect of Gods commandments. For as Plenty and Peace are the parents of idle security: so is security as fruitful in begetting and bringing forth both danger and subversion: of which, all estates in the world have tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their sins were again ripe for punishment, Jabin King of Ha- zor, after the death of Ehnd, invaded the territory of Israel; and having in his service 900. iron Chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subjection twenty years, till it pleased God to raise up Deborah, the Prophetess, who encouraged Barac to levy a force out of Nephtalim, and Zabulon, to in-counter the Canaanites. That the men of Nephtalim were more forward than the rest in this action, it may seem to have proceeded partly from the authority that Enrac had

T 2 among

among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievance, which in them was more sensible than in others, because Hazor and Harosheth the chief holds of Jabin, were in Nephthelim. So in the dayes of Jephtha the Gileadites took the greatest care, because the Ammonites, with whom the War was, pressed most upon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehud to deliver Israel from the Moabites: and by the counsel and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisera by Jael the Kenite wife; so was it his will at other times, to work the like great things by the weakest means. For the mighty Assyrian Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and restless, he overthrew by his own imaginations, the causers of his brutish melancholy: and changed his matchless pride into the base humility of a Beast. And to approve that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punisheth by invisible strength, as when he slaughtered the Army of Sennacherib by his Angel, or as he did the Egyptians in Moses time: sometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharaoh by the waves of the Sea; and the Canaanites by hail-stones in the time of Josua: sometimes by the ministry of men, as when he overthrew the four Kings of the East, Chedorlomer, and his companions, by the household servants of Abraham. He caused the Moabites and Ammonites to set upon their own confederate the Army of the Edomites; and having slain them, to kill one another in the sight of Jehoshaphat: and of the like to these a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Prophetess speak unto Barac in these words: But this journey that thou takest, shall not be for thine honour: for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which victory all the strength of the Canaanite Jabin fell to the ground, even to the last man: in the end of which War it seemeth that Jabin himself also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth of Judges.

kept the Sea-coast, and forsook their habitations towards the Land; and the children of Dan, who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for safety, shewing thereby that all were dispersed, and all in effect lost. She then cursed the Inhabitants of Meroz, who dwelling near the place of the battle (belike fearing the succell) came not out to assist Israel, and then blest Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent: shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Family of Heber were enforced in that miserable time of subjection, to hold correspondence with Jabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them means, they witnessed their love and faith to their ancient Friends. Lastly, she derideth the Mother of Sisera who promised her Son the victory in her own hopes: and fancied to her self, and described the spoils both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, she directeth her praise and thanks to God only victorious.

From the beginning of Jabin's oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased unto Israel, there passed 40. years. In which time the Kingdom of Argos, which had continued 544. years, was translated to Mycena: The translation of this Kingdom, Vives out of Peloponnesus waiteth to this effect: After Danaus, Lyncus succeeded in Argos, after whom the Children of Danaus the son of Lyncus divided the Kingdom; of which Acrisius being eldest, held Argos itself: Prætus, his brother, posselt Epheira, or Corinth, and Tyrinus, and other Cities, with all the Territory towards the Sea; there being many Monuments, in Tyrinus, which witness Prætus possession, faith Pausanias.

Now Acrisius was foretold by an Oracle, that he should be slain by the son of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he beguiled her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompany her. But the Lady being exceeding fair, it is said that Jupiter turned himself into a golden shower, which falling into her lap, begat her, with child: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings son, or other worthy man, corrupted her, or Keepers with gold, and enjoyed her, of whom Perseus was born; who when he grew to mans estate, either by chance (as Cicero saith) or in shewing his grand-father the invention of the discus, or leaden ball, to avoid the unwilling. After this, Perseus, to avenge the intamy of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdomes with his Uncle Prætus: and built Mycena. This imprisonment of Danae, the Phœces reporteth otherwise: and that she was was inclosed in a brazen vault under the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Upon this close custody Horace hath this witty observation:

*Inclusam Danaen turris aenea, Robustæq; fores, & vigilum canum
Tristes excubie muniunt sat
Nocturnis ab adulteris:*

*Si non Acrisium Virginitis abditæ Custodem pavidum, Jupiter & Venus
Risissent, fore enim tutum iter & patens Converso in pretium Deo.*

*Aurem per medios ire satellites,
Et pererrare amat saxa, potentius
Idem fulmine.*

The brazen tower with doors close barr'd,
And watchful bandogs frightful guard,

Kept safe the maidenhead
Of Danae from secret love:
Till smiling Venus, and wise Jove
Beguill'd her Fathers dread.
For chang'd into a golden showre,
The god into her lap did poure
Himself, and took his pleasure.
Through guards and itony vvaits to break,
The thunder-bolt is far more weak,
Than is a golden treasure.

The first Kings of the Argives were these.

Inachus the first King, who began to reign in the first year of Jacob, and the 61. of Isaac: from which time, to the end of Ethenelus, Cæter misreckoneth 400. years. This Kingdom before the translation, Eusebius accounteth to have stood 544. years, others but at 417. To was the daughter of this Inachus: whom the Egyptians called Jisr.

*Phoroneus, Apis,
Argus,
Firaus, Phorbas,
Triopas, Crotolus,*

*Sibeneus, Danaus, Lyncus,
Abas, Acrisius, Pelops.*

After the translation to Mycena, Mar. Securus finds these Kings:

Perseus, Sibeneus,

Eurythens,

Atræus } The sons of Pelops by Hippodamia: Atræus by Europe had } Thyestes, Agamemnon and Menelaus.

Agamemnon, Eurythens, Oristes,

Tisamenus, Penibulus and Cometes.

Of these Kings Mercator and Bunting leave out the two first, and the last, beginning with Eurythens: and ending with Penibulus. In Tisamenus time the Heracleide returned into Peloponnesus: of which hereafter. The Contemporaries of Barac and Deborah, were Midas, vvho reigned in Phrygia: and Ilus, vvho built Ilium: vvith others mentioned in our Chronological Table, as Contemporaries vvith Deborah.

s. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that lived in this Age.

Deborah and Barac being dead, the Assidians, assisted by the Amalekites, infested Israel. For when, under a Judge, who had held them in the fear of the Lord, they had enjoyed any quiet or prosperity: The Judge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious Idolatry. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did so master them in a short time (the hand of God being withheld from their defence) as to save themselves, they crept into caves of the mountains, and other the like places of hardest access: their enemies possessing all the plains and fruitful vallies: and in harvest time, by themselves, and the multitude of their cattel, destroying all that grew up: covering the fields as thick as grasshoppers: vvith servitude lasted seven years.

Then the Lord by his Angel stirred up Gideon the son of Josab, afterward called Jerubbaal: vvhole fear and unvvillingness, and how it pleased God to hearken him in his enterprise, it is both largely and precisely set down in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make them know that he only vvast the Lord of Hosts. Each of these 300. by Gideon's appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terour than force, vvith vvich he gave the great Army of their enemies an alarm: vvho hearing so loud a noise, and seeing (at the crack of so many pitchers broken) so many lights about them, esteeming the Army of Israel to be infinite, and stricken vvith a sudden fear, they all fled vvithout a stroke stricken, and were slaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and slain.

slain. In his return the Ephraimites began to quarrel with Gideon, because he made war without their assistance, being then greedy of glory, the victory being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprise) would no doubt have held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appealing them with a mild answer, followed after the enemy, in which pursuit being tired with travel, and weary even with the slaughtering of his enemies, he desired relief from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreshed) he might overtake the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had saved themselves by flight. For they were four Princes of the Nations, which had invaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which were taken already, and Zebah and Zalmunna; which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, sought the like relief from the inhabitants of Peniel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatened therefore the revenge, which in his return from the prosecution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that he would tear the flesh of those of Succoth with thorns and briars, and destroy the inhabitants and City of Peniel. Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse relief to their brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a victory: if I may presume to make conjecture, it seems likely, first, that those Cities lay over Jordan, and in the way of all invasions, to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their own peace with those Nations, and were not spoiled by them; or else they knowing that Zeba and Zalmunna were elap'd with a great part of their Army, might fear their revenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men: as it is not rare to find of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow the war, that both envy and maligne others, if they perform any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safety of their own Country, though themselves may be assured to bear a part of the smart of contrary success. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Country should suffer hazard and want, than that such men as they dislike, should be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

A place in Now Gideon, how or whereforever it was, as it were that he refreshed himself and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and pursued his former victory to the uttermost: and finding Zebah and Zalmunna in Karkor (suspecting no further attempt upon them) he again surprized them, and slaughtered those 15000. remaining: having put to the sword in the former attempt 120000. and withall he took Zebah and Zalmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had executed Gideon's brethren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slain: or (as it is written) at their own request slew them with his own hands, his Son whom he first commanded to do it, refusing it; and in his return from the consummation of this marvellous victory, he took revenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Peniel: forgiving no offence committed against him; either by strangers, or by his brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his own children found soon after his death, according to that which hath been said before. The debts of cruelty and mercy are never left unsatisfied: for as he slew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and unusual torments, so were his own 70. sons, all but one, murdered by his own bastard Almulec: The like Analogy is observed by the Rabbines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought upon the Egyptians, who having caused the male children of the Hebrews to be slain, others of them to be cast into the River and drowned: God rewarded them even with the like measure, destroying their own first-born by his Angel, and drowning Pharaoh and his Army in the Red Sea. And hereof a world of examples might be given, both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

In the end so much did the people reverence Gideon in the present for his victory, and there own delinquency, as they offered him the Sovereignty over them, and to establish him in the Government; which he refused, answering; I will not reign over you, neither shall my child reign over you, but the Lord shall, &c. But he desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden ear-rings which every man had gotten. For the Israelites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, used to wear them: the weight of all which was a thousand and seven hundred shekles of gold, which makes of ours 2380.li. if we follow the account of the shekle vulgar. And because he converted that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew silk, purple, scarlet, and fine linen, belonging to the High Priest only, and set up the same in his own City of Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatry, the same same was the destruction of Gideon and his house.

There was another kind of Ephod besides this of the High Priests, which the Levites used, and so did David when he danced before the Ark: and Samuel while he was yet young, which was made of linnen only.

Now if any man demand how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to destroy 120000. of their enemies; and afterward 15000. which remained, we may remember, that although Gideon with 300. gave the first alarm, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder; yet all the rest of the Army came in to the slaughter, and pursuit: for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out of Nephthali, and out of Asher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: For this Army Gideon left in Tents behind him, when he went down to view the Army of his enemies, who with the noise of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution.

There lived with Gideon, Agur, the son of Pandion, who reigned in Athens: Euryschem King of Mycena: Atreus and Thyestes the sons of Pelops, who bare dominion over a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Euryschem, the Kingdom of Mycena fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus, who holding his brother in jealousy, as an attempter, both of his Wife and Crown, slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be drest, did therewith feast their father. But this cruelty was not unrevenged. For both Atreus and his son Agamemnon was slain by a base son of Thyestes, yea the grand children, and all the lineage of Atreus died by the same sword.

In Gideon's time also those things were supposed to have been done, which are written of Dedalus and Icarus. Dedalus, they say, having slain his Nephew Atallus, fled to Minos, King of Crete, for succour; where for his excellent workmanship he was greatly esteemed, having made for Minos a Labyrinth, like unto that of Egypt. Afterward he was said to have framed an artificial Cow for Pasiphae the Queen, that she, being in love with a fair Bull, might by putting her self into the Cow, satisfy her lust; a thing no less unnatural than incredible, had not that shameless Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beastly spectacle openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater; of purpose, as may seem, to verifie the old Fable: For so it appears by those Verses of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable shew, as a goodly Pasiphae, in those vicious times.

*Junctam Pasiphaen Diæco credite Tauro Vidimus, accepit fabula præca fidem.
Nec se miratur Caesar, longæva octustas Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.*

But concerning that which is reported of Pasiphae, Servius makes a less unheeded construction of it, thinking that Dedalus was of her counsel, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretary of Minos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who begat her with child, and that she being delivered of two sons, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was feigned that (she was delivered of the Monster Minotaurus, half a Man, and half a Bull. But this practice being discovered, and Dedalus appointed to be slain, he fled out of Crete to Coccalus King of Sicily: in which passage he made such expedition, as it was feigned that he fashioned wings for himself and his son to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with boats which had oars only, Dedalus framed sails, both for his own boat, and for his sons, by which he out-went those that had him in chase. Upon which new invention, Icarus bearing himself over-bold, was over-born and drowned.

It is also written of Dedalus, that he made Images; that could move themselves, and go, because he carved them with legs, arms, and hands; whereas those that preceded him; could only present the body and head of those men; whom they carried to counterfeite, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarch, who had seen some of those that were called the Images of Dedalus, found them exceeding rude.

With Gideon also flourished Linus the Heriad, Theban, the son of Apollo, and Terpsichore, the Muse, who instructed Thamyris, Orpheus, and Hercules.

He wrote of the Creation, of the Sun and Moons course, and of the generation of living Creatures, but in the end he was slain by Hercules his Scholar with his own Harp. Again, in this age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus are thought to have been performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Corinthians Army, led by Oedipus, overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to those whom she mastered, was meant by the rocky and unaccessible Mountain near Thebes, which she defended; and by Oedipus dissolving her probleme, his victory over her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the body of a Lion, for her cruelty. But that which Pasiphae reports of Sphinx, were more probable, bable, did not the time disprove it, for he calls her an Amazonite, and the wife of Cadmus: who when by her help he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despicable part, with her own troop she held the Mountain by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharp war upon the Thebans, till by Oedipus overthrown. About this time did Atreus thrust his brother out of Oreus, and held sharp war with the Argians and Athenians, because his son Androgeus was slain by them. He possessed himself of Megara, by the treason of Scylla, daughter of Nisus the King. He was long Master of the Sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of delivering him every year seven of their sons: which tribute Thebes released, as shall be shewed, when I come to the time of the next Judge Thöls. In the end he was slain at Arif. pol. Camerinus or Camiens in Sicilia, by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Dadalus: and was esteemed by some to be the first Law-giver to those Islands.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Anteus the Giant, who was said to have 60. and odd cubits of length, which though Plutarch do confirm, reporting that there was such a body found by Sertorius the Roman, in Lybia, where Hercules slew Anteus: yet for my self I think it but a loud lie. That Anteus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler, Enchöbus affirmeth: and because he cast so many men to the ground, he was feigned to be the son of the earth. Pliny saith, that he inhabited near the Gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. St. Augustine affirms, that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra also which he overcame, Plato expoundeth to be a subtle Sophister.

S. VI.

Of the Expedition of the Argonauts.

About the eleventh year of Gideon, was the famous expedition of the Argonauts of which many fabulous discourses have been written, the sum of which is this:

Pelias the son of Neptune, brother by the mothers side to Jeson, who was Jasons father, reigning in Jolcos a Town of Thessaly, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heed of him that wore but one shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, invited Jeson to him, who coming hastily, lost one shoe in passing over a brook: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course he would take (supposing he were able) against one of whom an Oracle should advise him to take heed? to which question when Jeson had briefly answered, that he would send him to Colchos to fetch the golden Fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to undertake that service. Therefore Jeson prepared for the voyage, having a ship built by Argus the son of Phryxus, by the counsel of Pallas: wherein he procured all the bravest men of Greece to sail with him: as Typhus the Master of the ship, Orpheus the famous Poet, Castor and Pollux the sons of Tyndarus, Telamon and Peleus sons of Æacus, and fathers of Ajax and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two winged sons of Boreas, Amphiarus the great Soothsayer, Melæger of Calidon, that slew the great wild Boar, Ascalaphus and Jalmenus, or Almenus, the sons of Mars, who were afterwards at the last war of Troy, Læertes the father of Ulysses, Atalanta a warlike Virgin, Idas and Lyncus the sons of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Castor and Pollux, slew Castor, and wounded Pollux, but were slain themselves: Lyncus by Pollux, Idas by Jupiter with lightning.

These and many other went with Jeson in the ship Argo: in whose Prow was a table of the Beech of Dodona, which could speak. They arrived first at Lemnos: the women of which Island, having slain all the males, purposing to lead an Amazonian life, were nevertheless contented to take their pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: over whom then reigned one Cyzicus, who entertained them friendly; but it so fell out, that looting thence by night, they were driven by contrary winds back into his Port, neither knowing that it was the same Haven, nor being known by the Doliones to be the same men: but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies: by which means they fell to blows, inasmuch that the Argonauts slew the most part of the Doliones, together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day-light they perceived, with many tears they solemnized his funeral. Then departed they again, and arrived shortly in Myssa, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the son of Elates, who went to seek Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was ravished by the Nymphs.

Polyphemus built a Town in Myssa called Cios, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Myssa the Argonauts sailed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bebryses, the ancient Inhabitants of the Country, over whom Ankyus the son of

of Neptune was then King. He being a strong man, compelled all strangers to fight with him at vvhoribats, in vvhich kind of fight he had slain many, and was now himself slain by Pollux. The Bebryses in revenge of his death slew all upon Pollux, but his companions rescued him, vvith great slaughter of the people. They failed from hence to Salmydessus a Town in Thrace (somewhat out of their vvay) wherein Phineus a South-layer dwelt, vvho vvvas blind, and vexed vvith the Harpies. The Harpies vvvere said to be a kind of Birds vvvhich had the faces of women, and foul long claws, very filthy creatures, vvvhich vvhen the table vvvas furnished for Phineus, came flying in, and devouring or carrying away the greater part of the vvvituals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonauts craved his advice and direction for their voyage: You shall do vvell (quoth he) first of all to deliver me from the Harpies, and then afterwards to ask my counsel. Whereupon they caused the table to be covered, and meat set on; vvvhich vvvas no sooner set down, than that presently in came the Harpies, and played their accustomed pranks: vvhen Zetes and Calais the vvvinged young men saw this, they drew their vvvswords, and pursued them through the air: Some say, that both the Harpies and the young men died of weariness in the fight, and pursuit. But Apollonius saith, that the Harpies did covenant with the youths, to do no more harm to Phineus, and were thereupon dismissed. For this good turn, Phineus gave them informations of the way, and advertised them vvithall of the dangerous Rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of vvwindes running together, did shut up the passage; vvwherefore he vvwilld them to put a Pigeon before them in the passage: and if that passed safe, then to adventure after her; if not, then by no means to hazzard themselves in vain. They did so, and perceiving that the Pigeon had onely lost a piece of her tayle, they observed the next opening of the Rocks, and then rowing vvith all their might, passed through safe, onely the end of their Poop was bruised.

From thence forward (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades have stood still, for the gods, say they, had decreed that after the passage of a ship, they should be fixed. Thence the Argonauts came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabited about the mouth of the river Parthenius, where Lycus the King entertained them courteously, Here Idmon a South-layer of their company was slain by a wild Boar, also here Typhis dyed: and Antæus undertook to steare the ship. So they passed by the River Thermodon, and Mount Caucasus, and came to the River Phasis, which runs through the land of Colchos. When they were entered the haven, Jeson went to Æetes the King of Colchos, and told him the Commandment of Pelias, and cause of his coming, desiring him to deliver the golden Fleece; which Æetes, as the Fable goeth, promised to do, if he alone would yoke together two brazen hooft Bulls, and plowing the ground vvith them, loose Dragons teeth, vvvhich Minerva had given to him, being part of those which Cadmus did sowe at Thebes. These Bulls were great and fierce and breathed out fire: Vulcan had given them to Æetes.

Whilest Jeson was in a great perplexity about this task, Medæa the daughter of Æetes fell into a most vehement love of him, so far forth, that being excellent in Magique, she came privily to him, promising her help if he would assure her of his marriage. To this Jeson agreed, and confirmed his promise by oath. Then gave she to him a medicine wherewith she bade him to anoint both his body and his armour, which would preserve him from their violence: further she told him, that armed men vvould rise out of the ground, from the teeth which he should sowe, and set upon him. To remedy which inconvenience, she bade him throw stones amongst them as soon as they came up thick, vvwhereupon they vvould fall together to blows, in such vvise that he might easily slay them. Jeson followed her counsel; vvhereto when the event had answered, he again demanded the Fleece. But Æetes was so far from approving such his desire, that he devised how to destroy the Argonauts, and burn their ship; which Medæa perceiving, went to Jeson, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung on an Oak in the Grove of Mars, vvwhere they say it was kept by a Dragon that never slept. This Dragon was by the Magick of Medæa cast into a sleep: so taking away the Golden Fleece, she went vvith Jeson into the ship Argo; having vvith her, her brother Abrysus.

Æetes understanding the practices of Medæa, provided to pursue the ship, vvhom when Medæa perceived to be at hand, she slew her brother, and cutting him in pieces, she scattered his limbs in divers places; of vvvhich Æetes finding some, was faine to seek out the rest, and vvultier his daughter to pass: the parts of his son he buried in a place, vvvhich thereupon he called Tomi; the Greek word word signifieth Division. Afterwards he sent many of his subjects to seek the ship Argo, threatening that if they brought not back Medea, they should suffer in her stead. In the mean while the Argonauts were driven about the Seas, and were come to the River Eridanus: which is Po in Italy.

Jupiter, offended with the slaughter of Abfyrus, vexed them with a great tempest, and carried them they knew not whether; when they came to the Islands Abfrydes, there the ship Argo, (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) spake to them and said, that the anger of Jupiter should not cease, till they came to Anfonia, and were cleaned by Circe, from the murder of Abfyrus. Now they thereupon sailing between the coasts of Lybia and Gallia, and passing through the Sea of Sardinia, and alongst the coasts of Hetruria, came to the Isle of Æea, wherein Circe dwelt, who cleaned them. Thence they sailed by the coast of the Syrens, who sang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other side sang so well, that he stayed them. Onely Bules swam out unto them, whom Venus ravished, and carried to Lylibeum in Sicily to dwell.

Having past the Syrens, they came between Scylla and Carybdis, and the fragling Rocks, which seemed to cast out great store of flames and smoke. But Theseus and the Nereides, conveyed them safe through at the appointment of Juno. So they coasted Sicilie, where the Beeves of the Sun were, and touched at Coryra, the Island of the Phæaces, where King Alcinous reigned. Mean while the men of Colchos, that had been sent by Ætes in quest of the ship Argo, hearing no news of it, and fearing his anger, if they fulfilled not his will, betook themselves to new habitations: Some of them dwell in the Mountains of Coryra, others in the Islands of Abfrydes, and some coming to the Phæaces, there found the ship Argo, and demanded Medea of Alcinous: where Alcinous made answer, that if the were not Jafons wife, they should have her; but if the were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arcté, the wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them wherefore they of Colchos, not daring to return home, stayed with the Phæaces, for the Argonauts departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Island Minos reigned, who had a man of brass given to him (as some of the Fables say) by Vulcan. This man had one vein in his body reaching from the neck to the heel, the end whereof was closed up with a brazen nail; his name was Talus, his custome was to run thrice a day about the Island for the defence of it. When he saw the ship Argo pass by, he threw stones at it; but Medea with her Magick destroyed him. Some say that the flew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promising to make him immortal, he drew out the nail that kept his veins, by which means all his blood ran out, and he died: others there are that say he was slain by Pan, who wounded him with an arrow in the heel. From hence the Argonauts sailed to Ægina, where they vved, sail to fight for fresh water. And lastly from Ægina they sailed by Eubœa and Lochia, homing to Jolcar, where they arrived, having spent four whole months in the expedition.

Some there are that by this journey of Jafon, understand the mystery of the Philosophers stone, called the golden Fleece, to which also, other super-fine Chymists draw the twelve labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks, that by the golden Fleece was meant a golden book of Parchment, which is of sheep-skin, and therefore called golden, because it was taught therein how other metals might be transmuted. Others, would signify by Jafon, Wisdom, and Moderation, which overcometh all perils: but that which is most probable, is the opinion of Dercilus, that the story of such a passage was true, and that Jafon with the rest went indeed to rob Colchos, to which they might arrive by boat. For not far from Cathagin there are certain steep falling torrents, which vvalsh down many grains of Gold, as in many other parts of the World; and the people there inhabiting use to set many sieves of wool in those descents of waters, in which the grains of gold remain, and the water passed thorow, which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many rocks, straits, sands, and currents, in the passage between Greece and the bottom of Pontus, are Poetically converted into those fiery Bulls; the armed men rising out of the ground, the Dragon cast asleep, and the like. The man of brass, the Syrens, Scylla and Charibdis, were other hazards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediterranean Sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, under Poetical morals: all which Homer afterward used (the man of brass excepted) in the description of Ulysses his travels on the same In-land seas.

of Abimelech, Tholan, and Jair, and of the Lapythæ, and of Theseus, Hippolytus, &c.

After the death of Gideon, Abimelech his base son, begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembering what offers had been made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his their perpetual Princes; and, as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modesty) that some of his brethren might take on them the Sovereignty, practised with the Inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himself; who being easily moved with the glory, to have a King of their own, readily consented: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed seventy pieces of silver of their Idoll Baalberith, with which treasure he hired a company of loose and desperate vagabonds, to assist his first detestable enterprise, to wit, the slaughter of his seventy brethren, the sons of Gideon, begotten on his Wives, of which he had many; of all which none escaped but Jotham the youngest, who hid himself from his present fury: all which he executed on one stone; a cruelty exceeding all that hath been written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (though all-powerfull, and whose revenges are without date, and for everlasting) neither hath it respect to nature, which laboureth the preservation of every being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beauty which never dieth, and with love that hath no end. All other passions and affections, by which the souls of men are tormented, are by their contraries often-times resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth every vice, and is itself the child and darling of Satan, looketh onely towards the ends by it self set down, forgetting nothing (how fearful and inhumane soever) which may serve it: remembering nothing, whatsoever justice, piety, right or religion can offer and alledge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the error or weakness of the undertakers, and rather praisth the adventure, than feareth the like success. It was the first (in that the World had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into Hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient than man, and therefore no part of his natural corruption. The punishment also preceded his creation, yet hath the Devil, which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one as out of date, and to practise the other, as besitting every age, and mans condition.

Jotham, the youngest of Gideons sons; having escaped the present peril, sought by his best persuasions to alienate the Sechemites from the assisting of this merciless Tyrant, letting them know, that those which were virtuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happy estate of moderate subjection, had refused to receive as unlawful, what others had no power to give, without direction from the King of Kings: who from the beginning (as to his own peculiar people) had appointed them by whom and how to be governed. This he taught them by the Olive, which contented it self with its Fatness, the Figgetree with its sweetness, and the Vine with the good juice it had: the Bramble onely, who was most base, cut down all the rest, and accepted the Sovereignty. He also fore-told them by a Propheticall spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an easie matter to call those men back whom rage without right led on) Gaal the son of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem from the Service of Abimelech: who therefore after some assaults entered the place, and mastered it; and in conclusion fired the Town, wherein their Idoll Baalberith was worshipped, and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Castle or Tower of Zebur, himself was wounded in the head with a stone thrown over the wall by a woman; and finding himself mortally bruised, he commanded his own Page to pierce his body, thereby to avoid the dishonour of being slain by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech usurped the Government the Lapithæ and Centaurs made war against the Thebans. These Nations were defended of Apollo, and were the first in those parts that devised to manage horses, to bridle and to fit them: inasmuch, as when they first came down from the Mountains of Pindus, into the plains, those which had never seen horses before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Alexians, when Ferdinando Cortes the Spanish first invaded that Empire.

After the death of Abimelech, Tholo of Issachar governed Israel 23. years, and after him him Jair the Gileadite 27. years, who seems to be defended of Jair the son of Manasse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his own name, Havoth Jair. For to this Jair there remained thirty of those Cities which his Ancestor had recovered from the Amorites Of these Judges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument, that during all their times Israel lived without disturbance, and in peace.

When Jair judged Israel, Priamus began to reign in Troy, who at such time as Hercules sacked Thim, was carried away captive with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ransom, he re-built and greatly strengthened and adorned Troy; and so far enlarged his Dominions, as he became the supreme Lord in effect of all Asia the less. He married Hecuba the Daughter of Cisseus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fifty sons, whereof seventeen by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recover his Aunt Hesione, took Helen the Wife of Menelaus, the cause of the war which followed.

Theseus the tenth King of Athens, began likewise to reign in the beginning of Jair: some Writers call him the son of Neptune and Aethra: but Plutarch in the Story of his life, finds him begotten by Aegens, of whom the Grecian Sea between it and Asia the less took name. For when Minos had mastered the Athenians, so far as he forced them to pay him seven of their sons every year for tribute, whom he inclosed within a Labyrinth, to be devoured by the Monster Minotaur: because belike the sons of Taurus, which he begat on Pasiphae the Queen, had the charge of them: among these seven Theseus thrust himself, not doubting by his valour to deliver the rest, and to free the Country of that slavery occasioned for the death of Androgeas, Minos his son.

And having possessed himself of Ariadne's affection, who was Minos daughter, he received from her a bottom of thred, by which he conducted himself through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the City of Crocodiles in Egypt; by means whereof having slain Minotaur, he found a ready way to return. But whereas his father Aegens had given order, that if he came back with victory and in safety, he should use a white sail in sign thereof, and not that mournful black fail under which they left the port of Athens: This instruction being either forgotten or neglected, Aegens desiring the ship of Theseus with a black fail, did cast himself over the Rocks down into the Sea, afterward called of his name Aegens.

One of the first famous acts of Theseus, was the killing of Scyron, who kept a passage between Megara and the Peloponnesian Isthmus, and threw all whom he mastered into the Sea, from the high Rocks. Afterward he did the like to Cercyon, by wrestling, who used by that art to kill others. He also rid the Country of Procrustes, who used to bend down the strong limbs of two trees, and fastned by cords such as he took, part of them to one, and part to the other bough, and by the springing up tare them asunder. So did he root out Periphetes and other mischievous thieves and murderers. He overthrew the Army of the Amazones, who after many victories and valuations, entered the Territory of Athens. Theseus having taken their Queen Hippolita prisoner, began on her Hippolitus; with whom afterward his mother-in-law Phedra, falling in love, and he refusing to abuse his fathers bed, Phedra perswaded Theseus, that his son offered to force her: after which it is feigned, that Theseus besought Neptune to revenge this wrong of his sons by some violent death. Neptune taking a time of advantage, sent out his Sea-Calves, as Hippolitus passed by the Sea-shore, and so affrighted his horses, as casting the Coach over, he was (by being intangled therein) torn in pieces. Which miserable and undeserved destiny, when Phedra had heard of, she strangled her self. After which it is feigned, that Diana intreated Esculapius to let Hippolitus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because he was chaste, she led him with her into Italy, to accompany her in her hunting, and filed sports.

It is probable that Hippolitus, when his father sought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and did receive many wounds in forcing his passage and escape; which wounds Esculapius, to wit, some skilful Physician, or Chirurgion, healed again: after which he passed into Italy, where he lived with Diana, that is, the life of a Hunter, in which he most delighted. But of those ancient prophane Stories Plutarch saith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the World, where they find many vast places whereof they know nothing, fill the same with strange Beasts, Birds, and Fishes, and with Mathematical lines; so do the Grecian Historians and Poets imbroder and intermixe the Tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Theseus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom he made made his pattern, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being dispersed in thin and ragged Villages: in recompence whereof, and for devising them Laws to live under, and in order, he was by the beggarly, mutable, and ungrateful multitude, in the end banished. Some say, per Ostracismum, by the Law of Lots, or names written on shells, which was a device of his own.

He stole Helen (as they say) when she was fifty years old, from Aphidna, which City Castor and Pollux overturned, when they followed after Theseus to recover their sister. Erasistratus and Pausanias write, that Theseus begot her with child at Argos, where he erected a Temple to Lucina: but her age makes that Tale unlikely to be true, and so doth Ovid, Non tam ex facili fructum tulit ille petitus, &c. The rape Eusebius finds in the first of Jair, who governed Israel twenty two years, to whom succeeded Jephia or Jesse, six years, to whom Ishaz, who ruled seven years, and then Haddon eight years: in whose time was the fall of Troy. So, as if Theseus had a child by her in the first of Jair, (at which time we must count her no less than fifteen years old: for the women did not commonly begin so young as they do now) she was then at least two and fifty years old at the destruction of Troy: and when the was stolen by Paris, eight and thirty: but herein the Chronologers do not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting, with Halicarnassensis, do in effect consent, that the City was entered and burnt in the first year of Demophoon King of Athens, the Successor of Theseus, the Successor of Theseus, seventeen daies before the Summer Tropick; and that about the eleventh of September following, the Trojans crost the Hellepont into Thrace, and wintered there, and in the next spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second year, the next Summer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But S. Augustine hath otherwise, That when Polyphides governed Sicyon, Theseus, Athens, Tantanes, Assyria, Haddon, Israel, then Eneas arrived in Italy, transporting with him in twenty ships the remainder of the Trojans: but the difference is not great; and henceof more at large in the story of Troy at hand.

In Sicyonia, Theseus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight years, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His successors, Adrastus, who reigned four years, and Polyphides, who reigned thirteen, are accounted to the time of Jair; so is also Atreus King of Athens and Atrous, who held a great part of Peloponnesus. In Assyria, during the government of these two peaceable Judges, Mitres, and after him Tantanes reigned. In Egypt, Amenophis, the son of Kamefer, and afterwards Annumenes.

§. VIII.

Of the war of Thebes, which was in this age.

In this age was the War of Thebes, the most ancient that ever Greek Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly against the Peripateticks) that the World had a beginning, urgeth them with this objection:

— Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Rerumque & mundi, semperque eterna fuere,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Troje,
Non alias alii quoque res cecidere Poete?

If all this World had no original, But things have ever been as now they are: Before the siege of Thebes, or Troy last fall, Why did no Poet sing some elder War?

It is true, that in these times Greece was very salvage, the Inhabitants being often chased from place to place, by the Captains of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon he dwelt his own, longer than he could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourse they used little; neither did they plant many trees, or sow more corn than was necessary for their sustenance. Money they had little or none; for it is thought that the name of money was not heard of in Greece, when Homar did write, who measures the value of Gold and Brads: for the worth in cattle: saying, that the golden Armour of Glauco was worth an hundred Beeves; and the Copper Armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steal horses or kine was the usual exercise of their great men. Their Towns were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Aegina the principal City in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancy, and though in some small Towns of that half Isle of Peloponnesus, the Inhabitants might have enjoyed quietness within their their narrow bounds; as likewise did the Albanians, because their Country was so barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the Land in general was very rude, it will easily appear to such as consider what Thucydides the greatest of their Historians hath written to this effect, in the Preface to his History. Wherefore, as in these later times, idle Chroniclers use when the want good matter, to fill whole Books with reports of great Frosts, or dry Summers, and other such things which no man cares to read; so did they who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember only the great Floods which were in the times of Ogyges and Deucalion: or else rehearse Fables of men changed into Birds, of strange Monsters, of adultery committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begat, without writing ought that favoured of humanity before the time of the war of Thebes: the brief whereof is this.

Oedipus the son of Laius King of Thebes, having been cast forth when he was an Infant, because an Oracle foretold what evil should come to pass by him, did afterwards in a narrow passage, contending for the way, slay his own Father, not knowing either then or long after, who he was. Afterward he became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queen Jocasta, called by Hom. Odys. II. Hom. Odys. II. on whom, not knowing how to be his mother, he begat two sons, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in process of time, finding out by good circumstances, who were his Parents, he understood the grievous murder and incest he had committed, he tore out his own eyes for grief, and left the City. His Wife (and Mother) did hang her self. Some say, that Oedipus having his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his sons, because they suffered their father to be cast out of the Town, and aided him not. Howsoever it were, his two Sons made this agreement, that the one of them should reign one year, and the other another year, and so by course rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill observed. For when Polynices had after a years government reigned the Kingdom to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the first year, he refused to give over the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fled unto Argos, where Adrastus the son of Talaus then reigned, unto whose Palace coming by night, he was driven to seek lodging in an out-house, on the back-side.

There he met with Tydeus the son of O- neus, who was fled from Calydon: with whom striving about their lodging, he fell to blows. Adrastus hearing the noise came forth and took up the quarrel. At which time perceiving in the shield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lion, he remembered an old Oracle by which he was advised to give his two Daughters in marriage to a Lion and a Bore: and accordingly he did bestow his Daughter Argia upon Tydeus, and Deiphy upon Polynices, promising to restore them both to their Countries. To this purpose levying an Army, and assembling as many valiant Captains as he could draw to follow him; he was desirous among others to carry Amphiarus the son of Oicleus a great Soothsayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiarus, who is said to have fore-seen all things, knowing well that none of the Captains should escape, save only Adrastus, did both utterly refuse to be one in that expedition, and persuaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphiarus, offering unto her a very fair Bracelet, upon condition that she should cause her Husband to assist him. The Soothsayer knowing what should work his destiny, forbade his Wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the Bracelet was in her eye so precious a Jewel, that she could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controversy between Amphiarus and Adrastus, was by way of compromise put unto the decision of Eriphyle, either of them being bound by solemn oath to stand to her appointment: she ordered the matter so, as a Woman should that did love a Bracelet better than her Husband. He now finding that it was far more easy to foresee then avoid destiny, sought for such comfort as revenge might afford him, giving in charge unto his sons, that when they came to full age, they should kill their Mother, and make strong war upon the Thebans.

Now had Adrastus assembled all his forces, of which the seven chief Leaders were himself, Amphiarus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (in stead of whom some name Mecesteus) all Argives, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Etolian, and Parthenopius the Arcadian, son of Meleager and Alalanta. When the Army came to the Nemean Wood, they met a Woman, whom they desired to help them to some Water; she having a Child in her arms, laid it down, and led the Argives to a Spring: but ere they returned, a Serpent had slain the Child. This Woman was Hyphyte the Daughter of Thebes the the Lemnian, whom she would have saved when the Woman of the Isle slew all the Males by conspiracy, intending to lead an Amazonian life. For such her Piety the Lemnian Wives did sell her to Pyrus, and the Pyrus to Escurus Lord of the Country about Nemea, whose young son Opheleus, or Archemorus he did nurse, and loit, as is shewed before. When upon the Childs death he hid her self for fear of her Master, Amphiarus told her Sons where they should find her: and the Argives did both kill the Serpent which had slain the Child, and in memory of the chance, did institute solemn funeral games, called Nemean, wherein Adrastus won the prize with his swift horse Areon, Tydeus with the whorlbar, Amphiarus at running and quiting, Polynices at wrestling, Parthenopius at shooting, and one Ladonius in darts. This was the first institution of the Nemean games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are, who think that they were ordained in honour of one Opheleus a Lacedemonian. Some say by Hercules, when he had slain the Nemean Lion: but the common opinion agrees with that which is here set down.

From Nemea the Argives marched onwards, arrived at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them sent Embassadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Covenants between him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was thoroughly resolved to hold what he had; as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to try what mettle was in the Thebans, he made many challenges, and obtained victory in all of them, not without much envy and malice of the people, who laid fifty men in ambush to intercept him at his return to the army of which fifty he slew all but one whom he sent back to the City as a Reporter and Witness of his Valour. When the Argives understood how resolved Eteocles was, they presented themselves before the City, and encamped round about it. Thebes is said to have had at that time seven gates, which belike stood not far asunder, seeing that the Argives (who afterward when they were very far stronger, could scarce muster up more thousands than Thebes had gates) did compass the Town, Adrastus quartered before the Gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygean, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiarus at Phœbie, Hippomedon at Anchabé, Parthenopius at Eleûa, and Polynices at Hyphla. In the mean season, Eteocles having armed his men, and appointed Commanders unto them, took advice of Tiresias the Soothsayer, who promised Victory to the Thebans, if Menæcius the son of Croesus, a principal man of the City, would vow himself to be slain in honour of Mars the god of War. So full of malice and pride is the Devil, and so envious at his Creators glory, that he not only challengeth honour due to God alone, as oblations and sacrifice, withal Divine worship, but commandeth us to offer our selves and our children unto him, when he hath sufficiently clouded mens understanding, and bewitched their Wits with ignorance and blind devotion. And such abominable sacrifice of men, maidens, and children hath he exacted of the Syrrians, Carthaginians, Gauls, Germans, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or fear they were most filled with superstition. But as they grew more wise, so did he wax less impudent in cunning, though not less malicious in desiring the continuance of such barbarous inhumanity. For King Diphilus in Cyprus without advice of any Oracle, made the Idol of that Country rest contented with an Ox in stead of a man. Theribius forbade humane sacrifices in Africa, and crucified the Priests in the Groves where they had practised them. Hercules taught the Italians to drown men of hay in stead of the living; yet among the salvages in the West Indies these cruel offerings have been practised of late Ages: which, as it is a sufficient argument that Satan's malice is only covered and hidden by this subtilty among civil people: so it may serve as a probable conjecture of the barbarities then reigning in Greece. For Menæcius, as soon as he understood that his death might purchase Victory to his people, bestowed himself (as he thought) upon Mars, killing himself before the gates of the City. Then was a battel fought, wherein the Argives prevailed so far at the first, that Capaneus advancing ladders to the Walls, got up upon the Rampart: whence, when he fell, or was cast down, or (as Writers wave it) was stricken down by Jupiter with a thunder bolt, the Argives fled. Many on each part were slain in this battel, which caused both sides to desire that Eteocles and Polynices might try out the quarrel in single fight: whereto the two brethren according, flew each other.

Another battel was fought after their death, wherein the sons of Astæus behaved themselves very valiantly: Ismaeus one of the sons slew Hippomedon, which was one of the seven Princes: Parthenopius being another of the seven (who was said to have been been so fair, that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slain by Amphidicus, or, as some say, by Periclymenus the son of Nephtus: and the valiant Tydeus, by Menalippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought unto him by Amphyraus, which he cruelly tore open, and swallowed up the brains. Upon which fact, it is said, that Pallars, who had brought from Jupiter such remedy for his wounds, as should have made him immortal, refused to bestow it upon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might have continued immortal, did perish through the beastly rage that he shewed at his death.

The host of the Argives being wholly defeated, Adrastus and Amphyraus fled: of whom Amphyraus is said to have been swallowed quick into the earth, near to the River Ilmenus; together with his Chariot, and so lost out of men's sight, being peradventure overwhelmed with dead carcases, or drowned in the River: and his body never found, nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arion, and came to Athens; where sitting at an Altar, called the Altar of Mercy, he made supplication for their aid to recover their bodies. For Creon having obtained the government of Thebes after the death of Eteocles, would not suffer the bodies of the Argives to be buried: but caused Antigone, the only daughter then living of Oedipus, to be buried quick, because she had fought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creon's Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send forth an Army under the conduct of Thebes, which took Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argives to sepulture: at which time Boadice the Wife of Capaneus threw her self into the funeral fire, and was burnt willingly with her Husband. But it little contented the sons of those Captains which were slain at Thebes, that any less revenge should be taken of their Fathers death, than the ruine of the City: Wherefore ten year after, having levied Forces, Egialus the son of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopaeus, Athenelus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Euripylus of Mecebius, marched thither under the conduct of Alcmaeon, the son of Amphyraus: with whom also went his brother Amphylaetus. Apollo promised Victory, if Alcmaeon were their Captain; whom afterward by another Oracle he commanded to kill his own Mother.

When they came to the City, they were encountered by Laodamas the son of Eteocles then King of the Thebans (for Creon was only Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battel, and slew Egialus, yet was he put to the worst, and driven to fly, or (according to Apollodorus) slain by Alcmaeon. After this disaster, the Citizens began to desire composition; but in the mean time they conveyed themselves with their Wives and Children away from thence by night, and so began to wander up and down, till at length they built the Town called Esstiaa. The Argives, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Town, entering into it, sacked it, threw down the Walls, and laid it waste; howbeit it is reported by some, that the Town was saved by Thersander the son of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to return, did there reign over them. That he saved the City from utter destruction, it is very likely; for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the War of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

Of Jephtha, and how the three hundred years which he speaketh of, Judg. 11. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Acts 13. 20. 1 Reg. 6. 1. together with some other things touching Chronology about those times.

AFTER the death of Jair (near about whose time these things happened in Greece, and during whose Government, and that of Thole, Israel lived in peace and in order) they revolted again from the Law and Service of God, and became more wicked and idolatrous than ever. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal and Asteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen Nations adjoining, and embraced the Idols of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites, and Ammonites: with those of the Philistines. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites: so now he scourged them by the Ammonites, and afterward by the Philistines.

Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppressed, because they bordered upon the Ammonites, they were inforced to seek Jephtha, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was born; but he (notwithstanding those former injuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of devilish hatred and revenge, was content to lead the Gileadites to the War, upon condition that they should establish him their Governour after Victory. And when he had disputed with Ammon for the Land, disproved Ammon's right, and fortified fortified the Title of Israel by many arguments, the same prevailing nothing, he began the war; and being strengthened by God, overthrew them: and did not only beat them out of the Plains, but forc'd them over the Mountains of Arabia, even to Minith, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities expresseth heretofore in the description of the Holy Land. After which victory it is said, that he performed the vain vow which he made, to sacrifice the first living creature he encountered, coming out of his house to meet him; which happened to be his own daughter, and only child, who with all patience submitted her self, and onely desired two months time to bewail her Virginity on the Mountains of Gilead; because in her the issues of her Father ended: but the other opinion, that she was not offered, is more probable, which Borheus and others prove sufficiently.

After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either envious of Jephtha's victory, or otherwise making way to their future calamity, and to the most grievous slavery that ever Israel suffered, quarrelled with Jephtha, that they were not called to the War, as before time they had contended with Gideon. Jephtha hereupon inforced to defend himself against their fury, in the encounter slew of them 42000, which so weakened the body of the Land, as the Philistines had an easie conquest of them all not long after. Jephtha, after he had judged Israel six years, died: to whom succeeded Izabai, who ruled seven years: after him Elon was their Judgeten years: in all which time Israel had peace. Enschibus finds not Elon, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Judge was omitted.

Now before I go on with the rest, it shall be necessary upon the occasion of Jephtha's account of the times, Jud. 11. 28. (where he says that Israel had then possist the East side of Jordan 300. years) to speak somewhat of the times of the Judges, and of the differing opinions among the Divines and Chronologers: there being found three places of Scriptures touching this point, seeming repugnant or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute between Jephtha and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of S. Paul, Acts 13. the third is that which is in the first of Kings. Jephtha here challengeth the possession of Gilead for 300. years. S. Paul giveth to the Judges, as it seems, from the end of Josua to the last of Heli, 450. years. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Solomon's Temple, there were consumed 480. years. To the first, Beroaldus indeth Jephtha's 300. years to be but 266. years, to wit, 18. of Josua, 40. of Othniel, 80. of Aod and Sangar, 40. of Deborah, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Jair: But Jephtha (saith Beroaldus) putteth or propoeth a certain number for an uncertain: Sic ut dicat annum agi prope trecentissimum, ex quo nullus licet ea de re movet; So he speaketh (saith he) as meaning, that then it was about, or well-nigh the three hundred year, since Israel possessed those Countries, no man making question of their right. Codoman on the contrary finds more years than Jephtha named by 65. to wit, 365. whereof 71. were spent in Israel's captivity, at several times, of which (as Codoman thinketh, Jephtha forbore to repeat the whole sum, or any great part, lest the Ammonites should have justly objected, that 71. of those years the Israelites were in captivity, and vassals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred years, it was enough for prescription, he omitted the rest.

To justify this account of 365. years, besides the 71. years of captivity or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus his 266. he addeth also 28. years more, and so maketh up the sum of 365. These 28. years he findeth out thus: twenty years he gives to the Seniors between Josua and Othniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth eighteen years to Josua his government, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Josaphat's whereas Saint Augustine and Enschibus give him 27. Melandhon 32. The truth is, that this addition of 28. years, is far more doubtful than the other of 71. But though we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the years of affliction (to wit 34. years of the 71.) if we add them to the 266. years of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, we have the full number of 300. years. Neither is it strange that Jephtha should leave out more than half of the years of affliction: seeing, as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against the 71. years, and say, that during these years, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the author of a third opinion, making those 300. years remembered by Jephtha, to be 306. which odd years, saith he, Jephtha omitteth. But because the years of every Judge, as they reigned, cannot make up the number of 306. but do onely compound 266. therefore doth

Luther add to this number the whole time which Moses spent in the Deserts of Arabia Petraea; which forty years of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266, make indeed 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luther's judgment herein: for in the dispute between Jephtha and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon, in these words: Because Israel took my Land, when they came up from Egypt, from Arnon unto Jacob, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly; or in peace. So by this place it is plain, that the time is not to be accounted from Moses departure out of Egypt: but from the time that the Land was posselt. For it is said, quia cepit Israel terram meam, Behold Israel took my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking; which Jephtha's answer also confirmeth in these words: When Israel dwelt in Heshbon, and in her Towns, and in Arer, and in her Towns, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300 years: why did ye not then recover them in that space? 10 as this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. years: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents that Israel had to posselt it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me: for we do not use to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Junius nevertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and says, that this time of 300. years hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Jephtha's narration: when he makes a brief repetition of Moses whole journey: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Judges, in our translation in these words: And when Israel came up from Egypt, &c. and therefore Moses his 40. years (as he thinks) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. years: and not only the time in which Israel posselt Gilead, according to the Text, and Jephtha's own words: of which I leave the judgment to others; to whom also I leave to judge, whether we may not begin the 480. years, from the deliverance out of Egypt to the Temple, even from the first departure out of Egypt, and yet find a more probable reconciliation of Saint Paul's and Jephtha's account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet have been signified. For first, touching Jephtha's three hundred years of possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembered, that for a good while before the Israelites posselt it, Sehon and Og had disposselt Moab and Ammon thereof; so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession which they had, pass'd to Israel, and so Jephtha might say, that they had posselt those Countries 300. years, reckoning 266. years of their own possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings, Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

The second place disputed is this of Saint Paul, AG. 13. that from the end of Joshua, to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. years. And this place Luther understandeth also besides the letter (as I find his opinion cited by Fundius Krentzheimus, and Beza) for I have not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last year of Heli, but 357. years: and this he doth the better to approve the times from the egression out of Egypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first of Kings 6. is said to be 480. years.

Now so far much as Saint Paul (as it seems) finds 450. years from the death of Joshua to the last of Heli, and leaves but thirty years for Saul and Samuel, who governed 40. for David who ruled 40. and for Solomon who wore the Crown three whole years ere that the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was error in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of Saint Paul: to wit, Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450. years, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words [then afterward] being clearly referred to the death, or after the death of Joshua, as shall be hereafter proved. But where Saint Luke, rehearsing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350. years (with Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceived by the affinity of those two Greek words, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosiois, for Triacosiois; 400. years for 300. years; and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary judgment to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Beza begin at Moses death, he takes his account from the death of Joshua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. years: to wit, of the Judges (not reckoning Sampsons years) 319. and of years of servitude and affliction under strangers, 111. The reason why he doth not reckon Sampsons twenty years, is, because he thinks that they were part of the 40. years, in which the Philistines are said to have oppressed Israel. For it is plain, that during all Sampsons time, they were Lords over Israel.

Israel. So then of the Judges, besides the 111. years of servitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I have said) 319. years, which two sums put together, make 430. years. And whereas Saint Paul nameth 450. years, he finds 20. years to make up Saint Paul's number, to have been spent after the death of Joshua by the Seniors, before the Captivity of Cuthan, or the election of Othoniel: which 20. years added to 430. make 450. according to Saint Paul. To approve this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24. of Joshua, and the second of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the Elders that over-lived Joshua: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giveth 20. years, which make as before 450. according to Saint Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficulty in this opinion, if here also to the 20. years of the Seniors between Joshua and Othoniel should be denied. For they which deny these years, and make Othoniel 40. to begin presently upon the death of Joshua, as in the beginning of this reckoning, they have 20. years less than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the years of affliction apart from the years of the Judges) in the number of Sampsons years, and of the forty years of the Philistines oppressing the Israelites, they have 20. years more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. years of oppression all of them a-part from Sampsons 20. but Codoman, as is said, makes Sampsons 20. to be the one half of the forty of the Philistines oppressions; so that if the 20. years of the Seniors be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seems to enforce) that the Philistines in any Inter-regnum, before Sampson judged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40. years, besides the 20. while Sampson was their Judge; and so the reckoning will come to 450. years between the end of Joshua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the Seniors between Joshua and Othoniel: For, if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. years, to which if we add the years of the Judges, which are 339. we have the just sum of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seem to be much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, and read with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceive that this time of 350. years, is to begin immediately, or soon after the death of Moses: certainly the place of Saint Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, though it be received for true that there was unum scriptoris in the rest. For these be Saint Pauls words: And about the time of forty years, God suffered their manners in the wilderness: and he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450. years, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse he speaketh of Moses, and of his years spent in the Wilderness, then in the nineteenth verse he cometh unto the acts of Joshua; which were, that he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth Verse it followeth, Then afterward he gave them Judges about 450. years, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of Saint Paul's meaning, so far as my weak understanding can pierce it. The only inconvenience of any weight in opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is, that it seems irreconcilable with the account, 1 Reg. 6. 11. For if indeed there were spent 450. years between the end of Joshua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480. years between the beginning of the Israelites journeying from Egypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Solomon. To this difficulty Codoman answereth, that these 480. years, 1 Reg. 6. 1. must begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their journeying from Egypt, which he makes to be 25. years after the beginning of Othoniels government; from whence if we cast the years of the Judges, with the years of servitude (which sums, according to his account, of which we have already spoken, make 397. years) and so to these years add the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of David, and the 3. of Solomon, we shall have the just sum of 480. years. Neither is it hard, faith he, that the annus egressionis, 1 Kings 6. 1. should be understood egressionis non incipientis, sed finitæ, the year of their coming out of Egypt (for so it is in the original) or the year after they came out of Egypt, may well be understood for the year after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandering from thence. For so we find that things which were done forty years after they had set foot out of Egypt, are said to have been done in their going out of Egypt; as Psal. 114. When Israel came out of Egypt, Jordan was driven back. And Dent. 4. 45. These are the testimonyes which Moses spake when they came out of Egypt. And thus far it seems we may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the ab exitu, to be as much as quum exivissent, or ab exitu finito: for if Junius, Dent. 4. 45. do well read quum exivissent, for in exitu, as it seems that herein he doth well, why may not we also, to avoid contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, postquam exivissent?

The next point to be cleared, is how their journeying should be said not to have had end until the 25. year after the victory of Othoniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end, till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not until this time: at which time the Danites at length feared themselves, as it is declared, Judg. 18. For doubtless to this time the Expedition may most conveniently be referred. And thus without any great inconvenience to him appearing, doth Codoman reconcile the account of Jephtha, and of Saint Paul, with that in the first of Kings, c. 6. Now whereas it is said, that the Expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Israel: to this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that we should suppose that Othoniel lived all those 40. years of rest, of which Judg. 3. 11. so that by the 25. year after his victory, either he might have been dead, or at least, as Gideon did, he might have refused all Sovereignty, and so either way it might truly be said that at this time (to wit, the 25. year after Othoniel's victory) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers, grounding their opinions on the plain Text, vvhich it is indisputable, as it is in itself round enough and coherent, might perhaps be received as good: especially considering, that the speeches of S. Paul have not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they found, and are set down. But seeing that he wanteth all help of authority, we may justly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Laisb, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth year of Othoniel? Or what other probability hath he than his own conjecture, to shew that Othoniel did so renounce the office of a Judge after five and twenty years, that it might then be truly said there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes?

Now concerning the rehearsal of the Law

by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeed be properly said to have been, when Israel came out of Egypt: like as we say that King Edward the first was crowned when he came out of the Holy Land, for so all journeyes with their accidents commonly take name from the place either whence or whither they tend. But I think that he can find no such phrase of speech in Scripture as limiteth a journey by an accident, or saith by converting the proposition, when Jordan was turning back, Israel came out of Egypt. Indeed most improper it were to give date unto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely, to say, that King Edward at his arrival out of Palestina did win Scotland, or died at Carlisle. How may we then believe that enterprise performed so many years after the division of the Land (which followed the conquest at the journeyes end) should be said to have been at the time of the departure out of Egypt? Or who will not think it most strange, that the most notable account of time, serving as the onely guide for certain ages in sacred Chronology, should not take name and beginning from that illustrious deliverance out of Egypt, rehearsed often by God himself among the principal of his benefits to Israel, whereof the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the year and moneth wherein it expired) and the form of the year upon that occasion changed; but should have reference to the surprizing of a Town by six hundred men, that robbed a Chappel by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to work in Gods Name? For this accident whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time given to it, or a time far different from that which he supposeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a year, because it best stood with his interpretation so to have it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it self.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirm, that the Apostle S. Paul did not herein labour to set down the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but onely to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, delivered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges and Prophets unto the time of Saul, did raise up our Lord Jesus Christ out of the seed of David the King, in whose succession the Crown was established, and promise made of a Kingdom that should have no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein he sheweth Christ to have been been the true Messias) the Apostle was so far from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the History being so well known and believed of the Jews to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40. years consumed in the Wilderness, whereof no man doubted, saying, that God suffered their manners in the Wilderness about 40. years. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the division of the Land unto the dayes of Samuel the Prophet, in whole time they required to have a King, there passed about 450. years. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an hundred and eleven years of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included with in the 339. years of the Judges: for this had been an impertinent digression from the argument which he had in hand. Wherefore it is not a work so needful as laborious, to search which of this place that which the Apostle did not here intend to teach, when the sum of 480. years is so expressly and purposely set down.

Now that the vvords of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the copy through error of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronology, but must be taken, as having reference to the memory and apprehension of the vulgar, it is evident by his ascribing in the same place 40. years to the reign of Saul: whereas it is manifest that those years were divided between Saul and Samuel, yet that far the greater part of them were spent under the government of the Prophet, howsoever they are here included in the reign of the King. As for those that vvith so much cunning forsake the general opinion, vvhen it favoureth not such exposition as they bring out of a good mind, to help vvhere the need is not over-great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The vvords of S. Paul were sufficiently justified by Bernardus, as having reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those days, that the 111. years of servitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. years ascribed to the Judges, vvvhich account the Apostle vvould not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speak as the vulgar, qualifying it vvith a quasi, where he saith, quasi quadringenis & quinquaginta annis: As it were four hundred and fifty years. But Codoman being not thus contented, vvould needs have it be so indeed, and therefore disjoyns the members to make the account even. In so doing he hatheth himself against a notable Text, whereupon all Authors have builded,

(as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth call up the years from the departure out of Egypt, unto the building of Solomon's Temple, not omitting the very moneth it self.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) having already given faith to his own interpretation of S. Paul, he thinketh it more needful to find some new exposition for that vvvhich is of it self most plain, and to examine his own conjecture upon a place that is full of controverfie. Thus by expounding after a strange Method, that vvvhich is manifest by that vvvhich is obscure, he loseth himself in those vvayes vvvherein before him never man vvalked. Surely if one should urge him to give reason of these new opinions, he must needs answer, that Othoniel could not govern above 25. years, because then vvvas the taking of Laisb; at vvvhich time there was no King in Israel; That the Danites must needs have taken Laisb at that time, because else we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might be termed the coming of Israel out of Egypt, vvithout excluding the years of servitude; And that the years of servitude must needs be included, for that otherwise he himself should have spent his time vainly, in seeking to pleasure S. Paul with an exposition. Whether this ground be strong enough to uphold a Paradox, I leave it to the decision of the judicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our story. To the time of Jephtha are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the provisions which her husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycene, made for her recovery. Others refer this rape of Helen to the fourth year of Ithacan: from vvvhich time, if the war of Troy (as they suppose) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elon, yet the Greeks had fix years to prepare themselves: the rule holding not true in this War, Longa preparatio belli celerem affert vvictoriam; That a long preparation begets a speedy vvictory: for the Greeks consumed ten years in the attempt; and Troy, as it seems, was entred, sacked, and burnt in the third year of Habdon.

Three years after Troy taken, which was in the fix year of Habdon, Enneas arrived in Italy. Habdon in the eighth year of his rule, died, after he had been the Father of 40. sons, and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40. years of Israel's oppression by the Philistines (of vvvhich Judg. 13. v. 1.) took beginning from the ninth year year of Jair, and ended with the last of Habdon: I see no reason for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrel against Jephtha, for not calling them to war over Jordan, if the Philistines had held them in servitude in their own territories; and if Ephraim could have brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppressed: and had it been true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather have fought against the Philistines with so powerful an Army for their own deliverance, than against their own brethren the Israelites? but Ammon being overthrown, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore these 40. years must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Sampson, and afterward: or else they must be referred to the Interregnum between the death of Habdon, and the deliverance of Israel by Sampson, such as it was.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the War of Troy.

S. I.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets, how they have observed historical truth.

THe War at Troy, with other stories hereupon depending (because the ruine of this City, by most Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon Judge of Israel, whom in the last place I have mentioned) I rather choose here to treat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineal descent of their Princes, than to break the story into peices by rehearsing a-part in divers years, the diversity of occurrences.

The History of the ancient Kings of Troy is uncertain, in regard both of their original, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Tenor and Dardanus were the two Founders of that Kingdom. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if he (as Reineccius thinks) took from Berosus, it is the more probable: if Amnius borrowed it of him, then it rests upon the authority of Virgil, who faith thus:

Creta Jovis magni medio jacet insula Ponto:
Mons Idæus ubi, & gentis cunabula nostræ.
Centum Urbes habitant magnas, uberrima regna:
Maximus unde Pater (si ritè audita recorde) Teucus Rhæteus primum est advectus ad
oras: Optavitque locum regno. Nondum Ilum &
arces, Pergamæ steterant: habitabant vallibus
imæ.
Hinc Mater cultrix Cybele, Corybantiæque æra, Idæumque nemus.

In the main Sea the Ile of Crete doth lie:
Where Jove was born, thence is our progeny.

There is a mount Ida: there in fruitful Land

An hundred great and goodly Cities stand.

Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame) Tenor the eldest of our grand-fires came To the Rhætean shores: and reigned there, Ere yet fair Ilion was built, and ere

The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they fought

In lowest Vales. Hence Cybele rites were brought:

Hence Corybantian Cymbals did remove; And hence the name of our Idæan grove.

Thus it seemeth by Virgil, who followed surely good authority, that Tenor first gave name to that Countrey, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same book he speaks thus:

Est locus, Hesperiam Græti cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque ubere glebe,
Oenotri colere viri; nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ducts de nomine gentem.
Hæ nobis propriæ sedes: hinc Dardaniæ ortus:
Josinque Pater, genus à quo principe nostrum.

Hesperia the Græcians call the place:
An ancient fruitful Land, a warlike race, Oenotrians

Oenotrians held it: now the later progeny Gives it their Captains name, & calls it Italy; This feat belongs to us; hence Dardanus, Hence came the Author of your stock, Jafus.

Atque equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis Arunceus ita fere senes, hic ortus ad agris
Dardanus Idæus Phrygiæ penetravit ad urbes, Threiciamque Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrhæna ab sede profectum, Aurea nunc solio stellantis regia cæli accipit, &c.

Some old Arunceans, I remember well,
(Though time have made the fame obscure) would tell

Of Dardanus, how born in Italy,
From hence he into Phrygia did flee.

And leaving Tuscaine (where he earst had place)

With Corytus did sail to Samothrace;
But now inthronized he sits on high,
In golden Palace of the starry Sky.

But contrary to this, and so many Authors, approving and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that these names, Troes, Teucris, & Thracees, are derived from Tiras or Thiras the son of Japhet: and that the Dardaniæ, Myrians, and Ascanians, mixt with the Trojans, were Germane Nations, descended from Askenaz, the son of Gomer: of whom the Country, Lake, and River of Ascanius in Asia took name. That Askenaz gave name to those places and people, it is not unlikely: neither is it unlikely, that the Ascanii, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times pass into Europe: that the name of Tenor came of Tyras, the conjecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Tenor, whereas Halicarnameus makes him an Albanian, I find none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reported him to be of Crete, whose authority is the more to be regarded, because he had good means to find the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow, seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Tenor were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, & others that think him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Son of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Country, not founder of the City; and his Daughter or Niece Batia was the second wife of Dardanus founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gave his daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus: and that these were parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise; and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the son of Electra by Jupiter, which Electra was the daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus King of Hoturia, to whom she bare Jafus. Amnius out of his Berosus finds the name of Camboblascom, to whom he gives the addition of Corytus, as a Title of dignity, making him Father of Dardanus and Jafus; and further telling us very particularly of the faction between these Brethren, which grew to such a heat, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and therefore fled into Samothrace. The obscurity of the History gives leave to Amnius of saying what he list. I, that love not to use such liberty, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Son of Jupiter, it must have been of some elder Jupiter than the Father of those that lived about the war of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often been said) there were many Jupiters, and many of almost every name of gods: but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my self with making any narrow search into these fabulous Antiquities, but set down the Pedigree according to the general fame; allowing to Tenor such Parents as Diodorus gives, because others giving him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

i. 3. Boccace de

Concerning the beginning & continuance of the Trojan Kingdom, with the length of every Kings reign, I have chosen good Authors to be my guides; that in a History, whereon depends the most ancient computation of times among the Greeks, I might not follow incertainties, ill cohering with the consent of Writers, and general passage of things elsewhere done. And first for the destruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that City whilst it stood, it is reckoned by Diodorus to be 780. years more ancient then the beginning of the thirty fourth Olympiad. Whereas therefore

372. did pass between the beginning of the Olympiads, and the first year of the 94. it is manifest that the remainder of 780. years, that is, 408. years vvent between the destruction of Troy, and the first institution of those games by Athens; if the authority of Diodorus be good proof, vvhoe elsewhere tels us, that the return of the Heraclics, vvhich vvas 80. years after the fall of Troy, vvas 328. years before the first Olympiad.

Hereunto agrees the authority of Dionysius Halicarnassensis, vvhoe placing the foundation of Rome in the first of the leventh Olympiad, that is, four and twenty years after the beginning of those games, accounts it 432. later then the fall of Troy. Solinus in express words, makes the institution of the Olympiads by Athens; vvhom he calleth Athens, 480. years later than the destruction of Troy. The sum is easily collected by necessary inference out of divers other places in the same book.

Hereunto doth Ensebius, reckoning exclusively agree; and Erastosthenes (as is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus) makes up out of many particulars, the same total sum, vvvanting, but one year, as reckoning likewise exclusively.

The other collections of divers Writers that are cited by Clemens in the same place, do neither cohere any vvay, nor depend upon any collateral History, by vvvhich they may be verified.

The destruction of Troy being in the year before the Olympiads four hundred & eight; vve must seek the continuance of that from the beginning to the end, out of Ensebius, who leads us from Dardanius on-wards, through the reigns of four Kings, by the space of two hundred and five and twenty years, and after of Priamus, with whom also at length it ended. As for the time, which passed under Laomedon; we are fain to do as others have done before us, and take it upon trust from Annius his Authors; believing Manetho so much the rather, for that in his account of the former Kings reigns, and of Priamus, he is found to agree with Ensebius, which may give us leave to think that Annius hath not herein corrupted him: But in this point we need not to be very scrupulous: for seeing that no History or account of time depends upon the reign of the former Kings, but only upon the ruins of the City under Priamus, it may suffice that we are careful to place that memorable accident in the due year.

True it is, that some objections appearing weighty, may be alledged in maintenance of different computations, which with the answers I purposely omit, as not willing to dispute of those years, wherein the Greeks knew no good form of a year; but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorable, and acknowledged by all Writers, whereof this destruction of Troy was one of the most renowned.

The first enterprife that was undertaken by general consent of all Greece, was the last war of Troy, which hath been famous even to this day, for the numbers of Princes and valiant Commanders there assembled, the great battails fought with variable success, the long endurance of the siege, the destruction of that great City; and the may Colonies planted in sundry countries, as well by the remainder of the Trojans, as by the victorious Greeks after their unfortunate return. All which things, with enumerable circumstances of especial note, have been delivered unto posterity, by the excellent wits of many Writers, especially by the Poems of that great Homew, whose Verses have given immortality to the action, which might else perhaps have been buried in oblivion; among other worthy deeds, done both before and since that time. For it is true which Horace saith:

*Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona
Multi, sed omnes illacrymabiles Videntur, ignotique longa
Nocte: carent quia vate sacro.*

Many by valour have deserv'd renown
Ere Agamemnon; yet lie all oppress'd
Under long night, unwept for, and unknown:
For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilst these Writers have with strange fables, or (to speak the best of them) with Allegories far strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble undertakers: they have both drawn into suspicion that great virtue which they sought to adorn, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the History, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that we seek for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in whose works are both profit and delight; yet small profit to those which are delighted otherwise: but such as can interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall finde matter in Poems, not unworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of Authors, written of this great war. All Writers consent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris the son of Priamus, was the cause of taking Arms: but how he was hereunto emboldened, it is doubtful.

§. II.

Of the rape of Helen : and strength of both sides for the War.

Herodotus fetcheth the cause of this rape from very far ; saying, That whereas the Phœnicians had ravished Io, and carried her into Egypt, the Greeks, to be revenged on the Barbarians, did first ravish Europa, whom they brought out of Phœnicia into Creta, and afterward Medæa, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Io. By these deeds of the Greeks, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirms) was emboldened to do the like; not fearing such revenge as ensued. But all this narration seems frivolous. For what had the King of Colchos to do with the injury of the Phœnicians ? Or how could the Greeks, as in revenge of Io, plead any quarrel against him, that never had heard the name of Phœnicians ? Thucydides, a writer of unquestionable sincerity, maketh it plain, that the name of Barbarians was not used at all in Homers time, which was long after the War of Troy; and that the Greeks themselves were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were unreasonable to think, that they should have sought revenge upon all Nations, as barbarous, for the injury received by one: or that all people else should have effectmed of the Greeks, as of a people opposed to all the World; and that even then when as the Greeks had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redelivery of Hesione, King Priamus his sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and given to Telamon. This may have been true: for Telamon (as it seems) was a cruel man, seeing his own son Tenear durst not come in his sight, after the war of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, only because his brother Ajax (which Tenear could not remedy) had slain himself. Yet, were it so, that Hesione was ill entreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely that Priamus her husband, with whom she had lived about thirty years, and to whom she had born children which were to succeed in his Dominion. Whereupon I think that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medæa, or Hesione, but was merely incited by Venus, that is, by his lust, to do that which in those daies was very common. For not only Greeks from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greeks, as Herodotus discourseth; but all people were accustomed to steal Women and Cattel, if they could by strong hand or power get them: and having stoln them, either to sell them away in some far Country, or keep them to their own use. So did Thesus and Pirithous attempt Proserpina; and so did Thesus (long before Paris) ravish Helen. And these practices, as it appears in Thucydides, were so common, that none durst inhabit neer unto the Sea, for fear of piracy, which was accounted a trade of life no less lawful than merchandize: vvhether Tyndareus; the father of Helen, considering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape vvhich Thesus had made, caused all her Wooers, vvhovvere most of the principal men in Greece, to bind themselves by solemn oath, that if the vvere taken from her husband, they should vvith all their might help to recover her. This done, he gave free choice of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus brother to Agamemnon. So the cause vvhich drew the Greeks unto Troy in revenge of Helen rape, vvas partly the oath vvhich so many Princes had made unto her Father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon vvas not a little helping: for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, vvas Lord of many Islands: he vvas also rich in money, and therefore the Arcadians vvere vvell contented to follow his pay, vvhom he embarked for Troy in his own ships, vvhich vvore more than any other of the Greek Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon, and Menelaus; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise; take Arms against the Trojans. The Greek Fleet was (by Homers account) 1200. sayl, or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build ships with decks; only they used (as Thucydides saith) small ships, meet for robbing on the Seas, the least of which carried fifty men, the greatest 120. every man (except Captains) being both a Mariner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appears that the Grecian Army consisted of 100000. men or thereabout. This was the greatest Army that ever was raised out of Greece: and the greatness of this Army doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which ten whole years did stand out against such forces: yet were the Trojans vvhich inhabited the City, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homers Iliads; but but their followers and aids were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Misissia, and the greatest part of Asia the Isles, took part with the Trojans. The Amazons also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (though some think out of Ethiopia) came to their defence.

§. III.

Of the Grecians journey, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helena; being detained in Egypt, and of the sacrificing of Iphigenia.

Wherefore the Greeks, unwilling to come to tryal of arms, if things might be compounded by treaty, sent Menelaus and Ulysses Embassadors to Troy: who demanded Helen, and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answer the Trojans made hereunto it is uncertain, Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian Priests, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his return to Troy. The sum of his discourse is this.

Paris in his return with Helena, being driven by foul weather unto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuary. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. When therefore the Greeks demanding Helen, had answer, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the war, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the City taken, they perceived indeed she had not been there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to ask his wife of Proteus. Homer, and the whole Nation of Poets (except Euripides), vary from this History, thinking it a matter more magnificent, and more graceful to their Poems, for the retaining of a fair Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to deliver her. Yet in the fourth of his Odyssey, Homer speaks of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily believed that he made for pleasure, and if he were driven thither by contrary Winds, much more may we think that Paris was likely to have been driven thither by foul Weather. For Paris immediately upon the rape committed, was enforced to fly, taking such Winds as he could get, and rather enduring any storm, than to commit himself to any Haven in the Greek Seas: whereas Menelaus might have put into any port in Greece, and there have remained with good entertainment, until such time as the Wind had come about, and served for his Navigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirm the saying of the Egyptian Priests; which is, that if Helen had been at Troy, it had been utter madness for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the war, and so many of his sons slain for the pleasure of one, who neither was heir to the Kingdom (for Hecubus was elder) nor equal in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seem that Lucian spake not more pleasantly then truly, when he said that Helen, at the war of Troy, was almost as old as Queen Hecuba, considering that she had been ravished by Thesus the companion of Hercules, who took Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was sister to Castor and Pollux (he and Pollux being said by some to have been twins) who sailed with the Argonauts, having Telamon the father of Ajax in their company, before the time that Hesione was taken, upon whom Telamon begat Ajax, that was a principal commander in the Trojan war. But whether it were so that the Trojans could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Embassadors returned ill contented, and not very well entreated, for there wanted not some that advised to have them slain. The Greeks hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom some say to have been a Runagate Trojan, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captains, and all the Host with many troubleome answers and divinations. For he would have Agamemnon daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger he said, vvithstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrificed, or vvhether (as some vvrite) the goddess vvase contented vvith a Hind, it is not needfull here to be disputed. Sure it is, that the malice of the Devil, which vvait for all opportunities, is never more importunate, then vvhere mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greeks, that the taking of Troy vvase impossible, till some fatal impediments vvore removed: and that till ten years vvore past, the Town should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding, the Greeks proceeded in their enterprise, under the command of Agamemnon; vvho was accompanied with his Brother Menelaus, Achilles the most valiant of all the Greeks, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phœnix, Ajax and Tenear, the sons of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Nestor; Nestor and his sons Antilochus and Thrasymides; Ulysses, Menestheus the son of Petrens, Captain of the Athenians; Dionides the son of Tydeus, a man of singular courage; the wife and learned Palamedes, Acalaphus, and Jalmenus, the sons of Mars, who had failed with the Argonauts; Philoctetes also the son of Peaan, who had the arrows of Hercules, without which Calchas said, that the City could not be taken, Ajax the son of Oileus, Penthesila, Theas, Eumelus, Tyandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolamus the son of Hercules, Podalirius, and Maebon, the sons of Aesculapius; Epeus, who is said to have made the wooden Horse, by which the town was taken; and Proteflans, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatned death to him that landed first.

§. IV.

Of the Ath of the Græcians at the siege.

THese, and many other of less note, arriving at Troy, found such sharp entertainment, as might easily persuade them to think that the war would be more than one year's work. For in the first encounter, they lost Proteflans, whom Heclor slew, and many others, without any great harm done to the Trojans: save only that by their numbers of men, they were ground enough to incamp themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principal impediment which the Greeks found, was want of victuals, which grew upon them by reason of their multitude, and the smallness of their vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an Army. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the ground in Cherry-ness; others to rob upon the Sea for the relief of the Camp. Thus was the war protracted nine whole years, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the town receive little loss by them, having equal numbers to maintain the field against such Greeks as continued the siege, and a more safe retreat if the enemy got the better.

Wherefore Ovid saith, That from the first year, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all, and Heracleide commends as very credible, the report of Herodicius, that the Greeks did not lye before Troy the first nine years: but only did bear up and down the Seas, exercising their men, and enriching themselves, and so by wasting the enemies country did block up the Town, unto which they returned not, until the fatal time drew near when it should be subverted.

This is confirmed by the enquiry which

Priamus made, when the Greek Princes came into the field, the tenth year, for he knew none of them and therefore sitting upon an high tower (as *Hom*er tells) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all have been supposed that he should be ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the town so many years together. Between these relations of Thucydides and Herodicius, the difference is not much, the one saying, that a few of the Greeks remained in the Camp before Troy, whilst the rest made purveyance by land and by sea: the others that the whole army did spend the time in wasting the Sea-coasts. Neither do the Poets greatly disagree from these authors: for they make report of many towns and Ilands wasted, and the people carried into Captivity: in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the army could not well, nor would have spared, if any service of importance had been to be performed before the City. Howsoever it was, this is agreed by general consent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Camp, and a great pestilence arose among the Greeks: which *Hom*er saith, that Apollo sent in revenge of his Priests daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let go, for any ransom: but Heracides interpreting the place, saith, that by Apollo was meant the Sun, who raised pestilent Fogs, by which the army was infected, being lodged in a moorish piece of ground. And it might well be that the camp was over-pestered with those, who had been abroad, and now were lodged all close together: having also grounded their ships within the fortifications.

About the same time arose much contention between Agamemnon and Achilles about the booty, whereof Agamemnon, as General, having first chosen for his part a captive woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himself another, then Ajax, Ulysses, and so the rest of the chief Captains in order: when the South-layer Calchas had willed that Agamemnons woman should be restored to her father Apollo's Priest, that so the pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon, greatly rage, and say, that he alone would not lose his part of the spoils, but would either take that which had been given to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Ajax, or to Ulysses. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was fain to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to revenge her loss otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his Captains. But the Greeks, encouraged encouraged by their Captains, presented themselves before the City without him and his Troops.

The Trojans were now relieved with great succours, all the neighbour Countries having sent them aid: partly drawn to that War by their Commanders who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the War began (as appears by his words in *Hom*er), or for love of himself and his sons, or hope of marriage with some of his many and fair Daughters; partly also (as we may well ghesse) incited by the wrongs received of the Greeks when they wasted the Countries adjoining unto Troy. So that when Heclor issued out of the Town, he was little inferior to his enemies in numbers of men, or quality of their Leaders. The principal Captains in the Trojan Army, were Heclor, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, and the other sons of Priamus: Eneas, Antenor, and his sons, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Astus, and the sons of Panlhus, besides Rhesus, who was slain the first night of his arrival; Meganon, Queen Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the War. Between these and the Greeks were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tomb of King Ilius upon the Plain: and another at the very trenches of the Camp, wherein Heclor broke through the fortifications of the Greeks, and began to fire their ships; at which time Ajax, the son of Telamon, with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the only men of note that remaining unwounded, made head against Heclor, when the state of the Greeks was almost desperate.

Another batel (for so Antiquity calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who having obtained leave, drew forth Achilles Troops, relieving the weary Greeks with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Lionides, Ulysses, and the rest of the Princes though sore wounded, yet were driven to put on armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled the Trojans very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought back into the Camp: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torn from him by Heclor. It was the manner of those Wars, having slain a man, to strip him, and hale away his body, not restoring it without ransom, if he were one of mark. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, slightly armed, and commonly followed the success of their Captains; who rode not upon horses, but in Chariots, drawn by two or three horses, which were guided by some trusty followers:

of theirs, which drove up and down the field, as they were directed by the Captains, who by the swiftness of their horses, presenting themselves where need required, threw first their javelins, and then alighting, fought on foot, with swords and battle-axes, retiring into the ranks of footmen, or else returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began again with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were lost or broken. Their arms defensive were helmets, breast-plates, boots of brass, or other mettall, and shields commonly of leather plated over. The offensive were swords and battle-axes at hand; and stones, arrows or darts when they fought at any distance. The use of their Chariots (besides the swiftness) was to keep them from weariness, whereto the leaders were much subject, because of their armour, which the strongest and stoutest were heaviest, also that from them they might throw their javelins downwards, with the more violence. Of which Weapon I find not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driven to return to their tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewise of armours they had little change or none; every man (speaking of the chief) carried his own complete, or which if any piece were lost or broken, he was driven to repair it with the like, if he had any fitting, taken from some Captain whom he had slain, and stripped; or else to borrow of them that had by such means gotten some to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his armour which Heclor (as is said before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was fain to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might revenge the death of Patroclus his dear friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himself unto Achilles, not only restoring his concubine Briſeis, but giving him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next batel Achilles did so behave himself, that he did not only put the Trojans to the worst, but also slew the valiant Heclor, whom (if *Hom*er may herein be believed) he chased three times about the Walls of Troy. But great question may be made of *Hom*er's truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Heclor would stay alone without the City (as *Hom*er doth report of him) when all the Trojans were fled into it: nor that he could leap over the Rivers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must have done in that fight: nor that the Trojans, perceiving Heclor in such an extremity, would have for-born to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported only to grace Achilles, who having (by what means soever) slain the noble Heitor, did not only carry away his dead body, as the custom then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrusting leathern thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragging him shamefully about the field, selling the dead body to his father Priamus for a very great ransom. But his cruelty and covetousness were not long unrevenge; for he was shortly after slain with an arrow by Paris, as Homer says in the Scean Gate; or as others, in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to have married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too far in love, having slain so many of her brethren; and his body was ransomed (as Lycophron saith) at the selfsame rate that Heitor was by him sold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queen of the Amazons arrived at Troy, who after some proof given of her Valour, was slain by Pyrrhus the son of Achilles.

§. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden Horse, the Book of Dares and Dyctis, the Colonies of the reliques of Troy.

Finally, after the death of many Worthy Persons on each side, the City was taken by night, as all Writers agree: but whether by the Treason of Aeneas and Antenor; or by a wooden Horse, as the Poets, and common Fame (which followed the Poets) have delivered, it is uncertain. Some write that upon one of the gates of Troy, called Scean, was the Image of a Horse, and that the Greeks entering by that gate, gave occasion to the report, that the City was taken by an artificial Horse. It may well be that with some wooden Engine, which they called a Horse, they either did batter the Walls as the Romans in after-times used to do with the Ram; or scaled the Walls upon the sudden, and so took the City. As for the hiding of men in the hollow body of a wooden Horse, it had been a desperate adventure, and serving to no purpose. For either the Trojans might have perceived the deceit, and slain all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintain this report they are said to have thought upon); or they might have left it a few days without the City (for it was unlikely, that they should the very first day both conclude upon the bringing it into the Town, and break down their Walls upon the sudden to do it);

by which means they who were shut into it, must have perished for hunger, if they had not by insuing forth unseasonably discovered the invention. Whereas further it is said, that this Horse was so high and great, that it could not be brought into the Town through any of the gates, and that therefore the Trojans were fain to pull down a part of their Wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greeks did afterwards enter; it is hereby manifest, that the inclosing of so many principal men was altogether needless, considering that without their help there was way sufficient for the Army, so that the surprising of any gate by them was now to no purpose.

John Baptista Gramay in his History of Africa, discoursing of this War, saith that the Greeks did both batter the Walls with a Wooden Engine, and were also let into the City by Antenor, at the Scean gate: the Townsmen sleeping and drinking without fear or care, because the fleet of the Grecians had hoisted sail, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos; thereby to bring the Trojans into security. That the City was betrayed, the Books of Dares and Dyctis must prove, which whether we now have the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who have made mention of these Writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, have followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictory in most points to these two Authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they having served in that War made against the common report, had it not been that either those books were even in those times thought frivolous, or else contained no such repugnancy to the other Authors as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of men slain in this War, which Dares and Dyctis say to have been above 600000. on the Trojan side, and more then 800000. of the Greeks; it is a report merely fabulous; for as much as the whole Fleet of the Greeks was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their Army and deeds as much as he could, to be somewhat less than 1200. sail, and the Army therein transported over the Greek seas, not much above 100000. men, according to therate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of men to extol the deeds of their Ancients: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captains of the Greeks that served in the War, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Trojans and their City, from which the Romans descended. Yea the Athenians long after after in the War which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not bear to vaunt of the great cunning which Melissus the son of Potemus had shewed in marshalling the Grecian Army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had been a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeeld unto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admiralty of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200. good fighting ships, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanity possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the World, which have striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes that warred at Troy: all difficulties or unlikelihoods in such their Pedegree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probability, came of the Trojans, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romans, brought into that Country by Aeneas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Country adjoining, by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Heleus, the son of King Priamus. To which Hellanic addeth, that the Posterity of Heitor did assemble such of the Trojans as were left, and reigned over them about Troy.

§. VI.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greeks returning from Troy.

Concerning the Greeks, they tasted as much misery as they had brought upon the Trojans. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slain anon after their arrival: others were debarred from the Sovereignty of Troy, were wont to call it. The place where the Greeks suffered misery, and the unlucky City not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy, and those that warred there: the overthrow of which City, as hath been said, happened in the time of Habdon Judge of Israel, whom Sampson, after a vacancy or under several Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising upon the division of the booty, and the like occasions) at the time when they should have set sail, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediately, the other to stay and perform some sacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, half the Fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them failed to the Ile of Tenedos; where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned back to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his own course. But the whole Fleet was fore vexed with tempests: by the Adulter (as Homer saith) would not be persuaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor, and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus and Philoctetes, who nevertheless, as Virgil tells, were driven soon after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italy. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slain by his Wife, and by the Adulterer Egeus, who for a while after usurped his Kingdom. Menelaus wandering long upon the Seas, came into Egypt, either with Helena, or (as may rather seem) to fetch her. Dyffes, after ten years, having lost all his company, got home in poor estate, with much ado recovering the mastership of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and fain to seek out new habitations.

Ajax the son of Oileus was drowned; Tenar fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Danus, who was Lord of the Japiges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driven into Africa; others into Italy, all the East part whereof was called Magna Grecia, by reason of so many Towns which the Greeks were driven to erect upon that Coast. Finally, it appears in Homer, that the Gracian Ladies, whose Husbands had been at the War of Troy, were wont to call it. The place where the Greeks suffered misery, and the unlucky City not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy, and those that warred there: the overthrow of which City, as hath been said, happened in the time of Habdon Judge of Israel, whom Sampson, after a vacancy or under several Commanders, not very well
